PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.

In the contemplation of the prospects of the coming year it would be a poor philosophy which did not accept the teaching of the history of the twelve months which have passed. One lesson we have at least learned, and that is, that political prophecy is farther than ever from having been reduced to a science, and foreknowledge of events is more than ever a mere pretension. That rapidity of movement in the material world of which electricity seems to be the type, and which characterises the conduct of affairs in general, appears to have been extended to the action of politics and diplomacy. He must be a bold man who, setting up as a guide for public opinion, would predict the absolute and exact condition of the body politic, as it is constituted all over the globe, at the end of a given period. Progress and transition, for good or for evil, must be acknowledged as the normal attribute of the life of our times. Nevertheless, taking the aspect of things as it presents itself at this moment, there is a fair and reasonable basis on which to found a discussion as to what we might, or what we may, hope for in the coming year. England, at least, begins this year with ample and various energies and resources; she is animated by a strong and wide-spread patriotic spirit; her material power and disposable wealth are equal to any call that may be made upon them; and, if her responsibilities are proportionably increased, they carry with them their own inspiration and their own means of fulfilment. This country has everything to hope, and nothing to fear, from within; and it is to the consideration of her relations with the rest of the world that our thoughts must first be turned before we can attempt to estimate that portion of the future which is comprehended in the coming year.

In the year which has just expired, war, and still more frequent rumours of war, have been the ruling influences of men and things. But the dawn of 1860 is heralded by a proclamation of peace by the voice of that oracle for whose declaration it is in vain to attempt to disguise that the ear of the world was listening. More than this, every possible indication is afforded that the policy of France in reference to the affairs of Europe is coincident with that of England; and, that being an established fact, what is there left but the necessity that all the other Powers should follow whither that alliance leads, and submit to whatever it may dictate? The existing hostilities between Spain and Morocco do not now seem likely to lead to other complications; while, as regards the expedition against China, there are signs and symptoms that that necessary act of warfare may yet be satisfactorily averted. The small war-cloud that hovered over an insignificant island in the Pacific has been dispersed by the wise and temperate action of the Government of the United States; and thus it comes to pass that the gates of the Temple of Janus are but an inch or two ajar, and trembling towards an entire close. With that peace abroad which England desires, but does not stoop to crave, there is within her limits, and in all that bears upon her own immediate interests, much to animate and sustain confidence in looking forward to the business and the duties of the year. At this juncture her revenue, as it appears in her annual balance-sheet, presents a satisfactory state of things. There has been an increase in the Customs of £720,000; in the Excise, of £1,080,000; in the Assessed Taxes, of £73,000; and in the Post Office, of £150,000; thus showing a positive addition derived from ordinary and permanent sources; and, but for the circumstance that there has been a diminution in the receipts of the Income Tax, in consequence of the reduction in the percentage, and a decrease in the Miscellaneous receipts, consequent on our having had less old stores to sell, there would have been an increase in revenue, as compared with last year, of £2,000,000. At that sum is to be estimated the advance in the prosperity and the means of the country when the test of taxation is applied to it. Trade and commerce throughout the world have had of late to wait on politics and war; but yet that of England has exhibited a stability and a steady progress which give her a starting-point for the ensuing year on which she cannot be too well congratulated. If in 1859 our exports have exceeded those of former years by something over £13,000,000; and if manufacture has been more active and more profitable than has been almost ever known—if healthy, legitimate trade has been prosperous—the complaint that the dealers in money, and those whose operations are characterised as "grand strokes of business," have not had what they call their share will not meet with any great sympathy. It is a good sign for sober workers and doers when speculators sigh over the dearth of schemes, and members of the Stock Exchange draw their breath in natural and regular suspirations. At this moment Consols, the barometer of the financial atmosphere, are high, and vibrate but the fraction of a fraction from day to day; the rate of discount is low and money plentiful; railways are paying the best dividends with which they have been blessed for many a day; the East India loan has reached the dignity of a Government security because India is at peace, and a new system of government, legislation, and social organisation for that vast and important dependency of the British Crown is evidently in progress of incubation. Our colonies, treated as a judicious parent deals with the growing manhood of his children, are contented and tranquil, and it is pleasant to regard their youthful likeness to their mother country. Ireland no longer presents a difficulty, for we do not count for much that section of Irishmen who are the representatives of a school of politics which is born rather of passion than principle, and which they behold gliding away from the moral and social stage of their country like the misty fading of a dissolving view, and who, therefore, "rave, recite, and madden o'er the land," as their manner is. That disposition in certain men is chronic, but, happily, nowadays harmless. So let it pass.

Thus it is with England, and such is the position in which this country stands when she is called to meet the requirements and accountabilities of a new year. In legislation we have to look forward to Parliamentary reform, to change and improvement in mercantile and commercial law, and also in the law of real property. In administration we look forward to the better management of the affairs of our Army, of which the new arrangements in the civil and manufacturing, and the Staff College in the educational, departments are the initiation. As regards the Navy, we may calculate on the results to be derived from the system which has been established for the creation of a reserve of trained seamen, the want of which has been the main obstacle to that completeness and readiness of our maritime force, the supremacy of which all the world, our nearest rivals included, admits is essential, not only to our character and standing as a great Power, but to our very existence as a nation. And then, what of that tender subject under which every Englishman winces, and which tries the moral courage of every Finance Minister who, with bated breath and dulcet accents, makes his demand on that most sensitive portion of our national and individual organisation—our pockets. What of taxation? We have it on the authority of a Cabinet Minister, talking openly to his constituents, that any hope of a final and complete abolition of the income tax is as far removed as ever, although the special increase peculiar to the past half year is not likely to be continued. But we have something like a right to expect that at the present moment, when circumstances are singularly favourable for such an operation, some attempt should be made at a readjustment of our whole system of taxation, and that something should be done towards an equalisation of revenue and expenditure. It is well known that the cessation in the present year of certain annual charges connected with the National Debt will afford an opportunity of remission of some imposts, many of which do not repay the expense of collecting, and one at least of which presses unjustifiably on a phase of industry with which moral and educational progress is closely and inseparably identified. In short, now, if ever, is Mr. Gladstone's chance of an immortality to which that of warriors, poets, and statesmen of all times and all ages will be tame and ineffably subsidiary in the eyes of his countrymen, for he may, by a lucky inspiration, perform a financial miracle, and dilute the sharpness, if he does not succeed altogether in taking the sting out, of taxation. When the consideration of the prospects of the year has arrived at a point like this, it would seem as if it had reached its climax, and as if it only remained to add that, regarding that which is immediately before us, and which is in the last stage of conception in the womb of time, not in a spirit of mere optimism, but judging from a calm and sober point of view, we are justified in saying that most things seem calculated to work together for good in the year on which we have entered. Let us trust that such a prospect will not be marred by the agency of man's passions or of man's follies.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Emperor and the Empress returned to Paris from Fontainebleau on Saturday.

The usual receptions took place at the Tuileries on New-Year's Day. After the members of the Imperial family, the Emperor and Empress received the grand officers of the Crown, the Cardinals, Ministers, Marshals, Admirals, and others. At noon high mass was performed in the chapel of the Tuileries by Cardinal Morlot, Grand Almoner, Archbishop of Paris. At one o'clock the Emperor received the homage of the Diplomatic Body in the throne-room. His Eminence the Papal Nuncio addressed the Emperor as follows:—

Sire,—On the first day of the year which assembles the Diplomatic Body around your Majesty I have the honour, Sire, to offer to you its respectful homage.

The Emperor replied as follows:—

I thank the Diplomatic Body for the good wishes it has addressed to me on the advent of the new year, and I am especially happy this time to have the opportunity of reminding its representatives that since my accession to power I have always professed the most profound respect for recognised rights. Be, then, assured that the constant aim of my efforts will be to re-establish everywhere, insomuch as depends upon me, confidence and peace.

His Majesty afterwards passed before the diplomatic circle and spoke a few words to each Ambassador, making inquiries especially respecting the health of their Sovereigns. The reception lasted twenty-five minutes.

The Moniteur of Thursday contains a decree of the Emperor, appointing M. Thouvenel Minister for Foreign Affairs, replacing Count Walewski, whose resignation has been accepted. M. Baroche is intrusted ad interim with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs until the arrival of M. Thouvenel.

The Moniteur of Sunday contains numerous nominations to the Legion d'Honneur. Admiral Romain Desfosses has been appointed Grand Cross of that order.

A decree of the Emperor confirms the nominations of Secretaries of the Senate of the preceding year for next Session.

The Pays announces that the Powers who were to have sent Plenipotentiaries to the Congress have been apprised that the meeting cannot take place on the day originally fixed, and that a subsequent day will be appointed. So faint, indeed, is the probability of a substantial agreement among the Powers invited to the Congress that grave doubts are now expressed whether there will be any Congress at all.

General Cousin Montauban, Commander-in-Chief of the French expedition to China, who was promoted on New-Year's Day to the rank of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, is paying his farewell visits previous to his departure for Egypt, en route to China.

The stockbroker, M. Gilblain, has been acquitted of the charge of forgery. The civil process has yet to be decided.

The officials of the Octroi have taken possession of the posts established in the new inclosure of Paris, now, like ancient Thebes, become the City of the Hundred Gates. Under Louis XV. Paris had already considerably increased, and some neighbouring villages were added to it, among others that of the Roule, which was made a suburb of the city. In 1784, under Louis XVI., the farmers-general received permission to surround the capital with a wall, which is nearly the same as that now existing, but which will soon disappear. At that period the barrier-gates were almost all of wood, and the offices small wooden houses, placed on wheels for the convenience of locomotion. The barriers were sixty in number, classed in three divisions—north, south, and east. The new inclosure of Paris, with its hundred gates, its deep ditches, and its green slopes, will better respond to the grandeur of the city than the wall by which it has been hitherto surrounded. An immense number of Parisians did not lose the chance of profiting by the change in the barriers. During the afternoon and evening of the day before the alteration was effected they flocked outside the old barriers and made purchases of every kind; and for some hours before midnight all the barriers were crowded with vehicles and foot-passengers waiting for the moment when they might pass through without being stopped. When midnight struck the barrier-gates were thrown open, the Octroi men retired, and the whole body entered Paris and proceeded to their respective destinations, happy at having thus effected some saving, though at the cost of considerable trouble.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

A despatch from Madrid states that the Queen has received the most affectionate congratulations from the Emperor and Empress of Austria, the King of Sweden, and the Emperor and Empress of the French; also the Apostolic benediction of the Pope.

On Thursday the Spanish squadron burned and blew up the forts at the mouth of the river of Tetuan, and it was announced that the troops were in perfect readiness to continue military operations. Two tribes, not wishing to continue the war, withdrew to their mountains. On Friday evening the Moors vigorously attacked the Spanish encampment, "but were repulsed with great loss." The Spaniards "displayed great bravery; their loss, however, was not considerable." Lastly, under date of Monday, we have the following:—"After a glorious fight, the Spanish army, commanded by General Prim, has defeated the Moors on the whole line, and advanced as far as Castilligos. The Hussars executed several heroic charges, and captured a flag. The Moors were 40,000 strong, and lost at least 1500. The Spanish loss was 400 to 600. The greatest enthusiasm prevails in the army."

A telegram from Madrid announces that three vessels under English colours which had contraband of war on board had been seized by the Spanish squadron on the coast of Morocco.

A correspondent of the Morning Herald says that one Escalante, a British subject born at Gibraltar, who is employed as a colporteur or hawker of Bibles, has been apprehended by the Spanish police in Andalusia, at the instigation of the clergy, and is to be tried on a charge of attempting to vary the religion of the State, as no provision forbidding the sale of Bibles is to be discovered in the Spanish code.

ITALY.

M. Farini, Dictator of Modena, has published a decree introducing the Sardinian codes into the Romagna from the 1st of May next. By another decree its territory is divided into provinces, circumscriptions, and communes on the Sardinian system. We learn from Modena that, in consequence of a demand made by the Mortara family, who gave proofs to the Government that the kidnapping of their child had been ordered by the Rev. Father and Inquisitor Filetti, the latter has been arrested. Judicial proceedings have been instituted against him upon the charge of kidnapping a child.

The subscription got up a year ago for 100 cannons to garnish Alessandria as the stronghold of Italian nationality has produced 128 bronze guns. The total sum sent was 147,000 f., of which 17,000 came from Peru, Chili, Havannah, Montevideo, and the Brazils.

The official journal of Bologna announces that the Dictator, after having, as is known, decreed the expulsion of the Jesuits from the provinces of Parma, Modena, and the Romagna, has appointed a commission charged to take possession, in the name of the Government, of all the property of the company. The journal adds:—"The commission has already commenced taking possession, and its proceedings, encountering no obstacle, are effected with perfect regularity—they will soon be completed in all the provinces."

Garibaldi has resigned his post as president of the National Society—a kind of anti-Mazzinian association—but has, instead, accepted the presidency of another body, bearing the significant name of "La Nazione Armata." On this occasion he has published the following proclamation to the Italian Liberals:—

In the name of Italian union, without which liberty and independence can never gladden the heart of Italy, I summon you to the unifying banner (standardo unificatore) of King Victor Emmanuel. Let all amongst you whose souls burn with the sacred love of Italy forget their differences and embrace for your country's sake. With that noble intention the Liberals of the "Libere Comizzie" (an old political society) have transformed their association into that of the "Nazione Armata," and with that same intention I have accepted its presidency. May our example be universally followed, so that union amongst brothers should cease to be a mere wish, and become a fact. Let right, supported by arms, be our programme; let the liberation of Italy be our only wish. Closely joined in one phalanx, we shall henceforth have but one enemy before us, and shall live only in the hopes of Italian liberty. G. GARIBALDI.

Turin, Dec. 31, 1859.

There is additional news from Naples. The general amnesty had been deferred, but fifty individual pardons have been granted. It is asserted that the Neapolitan Government is resolved to undertake the task of proposing to the Congress, if it meets, the restoration of the Central Italian Princes.

AUSTRIA.

A Vienna letter of the 30th ult. states that the 5th corps d'armée has received orders to proceed from Venetia to Hungary, and place itself at the disposal of the Archduke Albert. There are no fears entertained, the letter states, of an insurrectionary movement in Hungary, so long as the peace of Europe shall remain undisturbed.

According to the ceremonial observed at the Austrian Court, the Grand Chamberlain of the Emperor received on Sunday at twelve o'clock, in the name of the Emperor, the congratulations of the Diplomatic Corps.

The Emperor of Austria has issued regulations which considerably relax the restrictions imposed on traders and artisans by the guild and corporation laws and customs. He has likewise instituted a commission for the management of the national debt and the sinking fund; and the directions framed for the commissioners' guidance are said to have given satisfaction in Vienna, though the state of the Austrian finances seems to render utterly superfluous all regulations for a sinking fund.

PRUSSIA.

A Royal order, signed by the Prince Regent, convokes the Prussian Chambers for the 12th instant.

In reply to a statement in the Kreuz Zeitung the Prussian Gazette says:—"The report that Prince Hohenzollern intended to resign the presidency of the Council of Ministers is totally unfounded."

The Conference of the German States on the seacoasts (which was convoked by Prussia on the 14th ult. for the purpose of discussing the question of fortifying the shores) will be opened on the 9th inst. at Berlin.

RUSSIA.

A letter from St. Petersburg of the 26th of December informs us that the sentence of imprisonment, military degradation, and loss of title inflicted on General Zatler, for having cheated the Government during the war in the Crimea, has been modified, through the intercession of Prince Michael Gortschakoff, the defender of Sebastopol. The ex-Commissary General Zatler has been simply dismissed the service, and retains his titles and fortune.

A letter from Warsaw of the 28th ult. states that the religious persecution of the Polish Catholics is not less constant, odious, and cruel under the present Emperor than under his predecessor. Some poor peasants living in the village of Dzeiernowieze, in the government of Witepsk, were lately prevented by the Russian Popes and gendarmes from assisting at the united Greek Catholic service, and were forced by the sabre to receive the communion in the schismatic church.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople to the 28th ultimo confirm the sudden dismissal of Kibrisli Pacha, and affirm that it was caused by his demanding a settlement of the debts of the Seraglio and Hareem. Ruchdi Pacha had been appointed Grand Vizier, and Aali Pacha President of the Tanzimat, which office was formerly held by Ruchdi Pacha.

It was believed that Mehemet Kibrisli Pacha would soon be reappointed Grand Vizier.

The friends of reform were dispirited, although Ruchdi Pacha has the reputation of being a reformer.

The new Grand Vizier has dispatched a note to the Powers promising his approval of the Suez Canal scheme, should they come to an understanding on the question.

M. de Lesseps was preparing to leave Constantinople.

UNITED STATES.

The Nova Scotian has arrived in this country from Portland, whence she sailed on the 24th ult. The position of affairs at Washington had undergone no change, and the annual message of the President continued in abeyance. Sundry additional efforts had been made in the House of Representatives to elect a Speaker, but without success.

A great demonstration in favour of the maintenance of the Union was held at the Academy of Music in New York on the 19th ult. The spacious building was crowded to excess in all parts, and several thousands were assembled in the surrounding streets, where impromptu meetings were organised. The Mayor presided inside the Academy, and the principal speakers were men of influence and standing. Letters were read from General Scott, ex-Presidents Fillmore, Van Buren, Pierce, and other distinguished men. Great enthusiasm was evinced, and a strong sentiment was displayed in favour of General Scott for the presidency. The meeting was expected to produce a salutary effect throughout the country.

News from California states that Judge Terry had been arraigned for killing Senator Broderick.

A four-story warehouse in Broad-street, New York, had fallen in, killing two men and wounding several others; and at Simsbury, Connecticut, a fusee-factory had exploded, entailing a loss of eight lives, with serious injury to four other persons.

INDIA.

There is important news from Oude, 2000 rebels, and their leaders Mammoo Khan, Khan Bahdoor, Kahn Beni Mahdoor, and his two sons, having been taken prisoners. The Begum escaped.

AUSTRALIA.

THE COLONY OF VICTORIA.

We take the following from the Melbourne Argus of the 17th of November:—

"We avail ourselves of the departure of the Benares to resume our monthly summary of events in Victoria. When the last mail for England quitted these waters it was at the close of a general election, which had resulted in the return of a large majority hostile to the O'Shanassy Administration. The convocation of Parliament was deferred to the latest practicable moment, but the postponement of the period at which the inevitable fall of the Ministry would occur merely served to strengthen public hostility. When the debate on the Address was brought to a close, the division list exhibited the following result:—For the amendment, 56; against it, 17: majority against Ministers, 39. The minority included five members of the Government, eight new members of the House, and Mr. John Thomas Smith.

"As a matter of course, Mr. O'Shanassy and his colleagues resigned, and his Excellency the Governor confided to Mr. Nicholson the task of forming a new Administration; and eventually the following list was submitted to the Governor, and received his approbation:—Chief Secretary, Mr. Nicholson: Treasurer, Mr. M'Culloch; Public Lands, Mr. Service; Public Works, Mr. J. C. King; Post Office, Mr. Bailey; Customs, Mr. Pyke; Attorney-General, Mr. J. D. Wood; Solicitor-General, Mr. Adamson.

"The short Parliamentary recess necessitated by the return of the members of the Administration to their constituents will terminate on the 29th instant, when the new Government will commence its duties, strong in popular favour, and in the support of the press throughout the whole colony."

NEW SOUTH WALES.

There has been a Ministerial crisis at Sydney.

Mr. Cowper's Education Bill has been rejected by the Assembly, and the rejection was immediately followed by the resignation of himself and his colleagues.

The Sydney Morning Herald says:—"The Ministerial crisis has, at all events for the present, passed. New South Wales has another new set of rulers. Mr. Hay and Mr. Jones having tried their hands at Cabinet-making without success, Mr. Forster—one of the glorious minority on the 'want of confidence' division—was sent for. He undertook the task of forming a Government, and he has succeeded. Keeping the office of Colonial Secretary and Premier to himself, he has Mr. Samuel for his Finance Minister, Mr. Black as Minister of Lands, and Mr. Eager as Minister of Works, the latter being in the Upper House. These four constitute the Cabinet. Mr. Wise has been appointed Attorney-General, but without being made a Cabinet Minister, and it is understood that Mr. Hargrave is to retain the Solicitor-Generalship. As to the two latter offices, Mr. Forster is adhering to the policy which he has so frequently advocated as a member of the Opposition—that of making them non-political. An adjournment for a month has been granted to both Houses of Parliament."

Two portraits of the Prince Regent of Prussia have been painted, to be presented to the Emperor of Japan by the Prussian Representative and chief of the mission about to visit the Japanese Court.

The Danish barque Danemark, which left Liverpool some time ago on a voyage to San Francisco, occupied six weeks in rounding Cape Horn.

The Ministerial crisis at Copenhagen has terminated in the Court succumbing, and the Chamberlain Besling, Private Secretary to the King, being dismissed.

At the trial of Mr. Giblain, a Paris stockbroker, accused of fraud, the President left 850 questions to the jury. The jury, after deliberating only an hour and a quarter, declared the prisoner "Not guilty" on every count in the indictment.

The Brazilian mail brings intelligence that General Urquiza's recent victory and the mediation of Paraguay have terminated the war between Buenos Ayres and the Argentine Confederation; the chief condition of peace being that Buenos Ayres shall once more become a member of the Confederation.

A letter from Calais states that an English sloop, the New Endeavour, of Dover, foundered off that port two nights back, in the midst of a violent snowstorm. The crew, consisting of five men, took to their boat, but, from the heavy sea, she upset, and all of them perished. Two of the bodies have been picked up.

We have advices from Hayti, dated at Port-au-Prince, on the 30th ult. A national bank of loan, for the promotion of agriculture only, was to be established under the sanction of the Legislature. It was hoped that the country would make much industrial progress under its operation, and the collection of foreign debts be facilitated.

Queen Louisa of Sweden, Princess of Holland, who married the present King while Prince Royal in 1850, has published, under the pseudonym of "Jane Wincome," a volume in Swedish, translated from the English, entitled "The Labourers in the Lord's Vineyard." The book is sold for the benefit of an hospital founded by the Queen soon after her arrival at Stockholm.

THE PRESS PROSECUTION AT HONG-KONG.—We are happy to announce, says the China Telegraph, that instructions went by last mail from the Duke of Newcastle, the present Secretary of State for the Colonies, to Sir Hercules Robinson, the Governor of Hong-Kong, sanctioning a mitigation of the sentence which Mr. Tarrant is now undergoing for a libel on Colonel Caine. The mitigation is left to the discretion of his Excellency Governor Robinson.

ERUPTIONS OF MOUNT VESUVIUS.—A new crater opened at the foot of Vesuvius on the night of the 23rd ult. from which two streams of lava are flowing rapidly. In the bosco belonging to the Prince of Ottajano two openings have been made towards Pompeii. On the 25th a portion of the upper crater of Vesuvius fell in, in the direction of Pompeii, as also towards the Hermitage. On the same day five currents of lava broke out at the foot of the crater, and proceeded like a stream of water.

SUSPECTED POISONING ON BOARD A LIVERPOOL SHIP.—The ship Accrington, from Liverpool to Calcutta, with soldiers' wives and families, put into Pernambuco, Dec. 4, in charge of the second mate, the captain and chief mate having died from poison in their food. The surgeon was poisoned, but recovered. Sixty-five deaths on board had occurred. The matter is being investigated by the British Consul.

Sir Hope Grant has arrived in Calcutta, to organise the Indian expedition to China. It is not in any case to exceed 13,000 men, and probably not 10,000. Of these, one-half will be Sikhs, but the regiments have not yet been requested to volunteer. The 67th and 3rd Buffs were dispatched some time since to protect the Europeans in Hong-Kong and Shanghai, and the 27th, 53rd, 60th, 76th, and 99th, with the 1st and 2nd Bengal Europeans, have been warned for service in China.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY.—On Monday the reception for the year took place at the seminary of the order of the Sisters of Charity, in the Rue de Bac, Paris. It is in this establishment that the young persons who have entered their novitiate are instructed in the duties of their sacred calling. The novices are permitted to receive the visits of their parents and relations the first Monday of every month, in the parlour of the building, which is capable of receiving some one hundred visitors. The visitors on Monday were numerous, and were composed of persons in every rank of life, from the officer wearing the decoration of commander of the Legion of Honour to the humble water-carrier. The young persons were all cheerful, and appeared to be delighted with their position. No matter what may have been their previous rank in life, these young persons are all dressed alike and perform the same duties, and the daughter of the water-carrier without fortune is as much respected as the daughter of the peer who has contributed £4000 to the funds of the order.

COMMERCIAL WANTS OF JAPAN.—A letter from the Hague says:—"We have received interesting letters on the commercial and political situation of Japan from merchants established in the port of Kanagawa. They state that the articles most in demand are tissues of all kinds; cotton prints, calicoes, flannels, camlets, and grey buckskin with small stripes sell best; then small-patterned chintz, woollen cloth, Utrecht velvet, red, blue, and cherry colour; red shawls with blue insides; cotton, and woollen blankets. Saffron is in demand, and medicinal substances, especially Peruvian bark, magnesia, &c. Glass wares and looking-glasses are sought after, but it is feared that importations will be too extensive; the same may be said of gin. Loaf-sugar would sell to advantage, imported in moderation, as would also elephant's tusks. Olive-oil, tin-plate, and Prussian blue are wanted. Of fancy articles, only the more useful should be sent. Sail-cloth and colours (white, black, and yellow) find purchasers; the Japanese using black most. At present, beer, wine, and butter are only wanted for victualling ships, but the natives will probably soon acquire a taste for them. The Government readily purchase muskets, but the Japanese are not allowed to keep fowling-pieces. Good barometers are the only philosophical instruments wanted. Cheap watches sell well. Good Dutch clocks also find buyers. It is not difficult to procure back cargo; most kinds of food are cheap, and sell readily in China. Indeed, many English vessels come from Shanghai in ballast, on purpose to fetch provisions. Japanese wax is not dear, being 45 francs per 50 kilogrammes, or less on buying a large quantity. Copper is also a good article to export. The exportation of the gold coin called kobangs is permitted, but the Government does not like to see it leave the country to any amount."

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams have been received through Mr. Reuter's office:—

DRESDEN, Thursday.—A telegram from St. Petersburg, published in the official Dresden journal, announces that the departure of Prince Gortschakoff for Paris has been postponed indefinitively.

VIENNA, Thursday.—Baron Brenner, who is definitively appointed Austrian Ambassador at Turin, has arrived here from Athens, en route for his destination.

Thomas Garrett, of Wilmington, Del., a venerable Quaker, stated at the John Brown meeting in Philadelphia that he had been instrumental in aiding 2245 slaves to escape by the "underground railroad," besides about 200 more whom he had assisted before he had begun to keep an account.

The Royal Mail Company have abolished the system of paying their commanders chiefly by percentages. The commanders are to be paid in future by salaries only. The captains of the Atlantic packets are to receive each £1000 a year, of the Brazil packets £900 a year, of the inter-colonial packets £800 a year, after six years' service, and £600 a year under six years' service.

MARSHAL O'DONNELL.—They halt just by the tent of the General-in-Chief, outside of which is standing, regardless and apparently unconscious of the heavy rain, a tall, greyhaired man, seemingly about fifty-five years of age, dressed in a waterproof coat and macintosh leggings, the only military part of his costume being the "ros" or Spanish kepi, with three bands of gold embroidery round it, indicating the rank of Captain-General, equivalent to Field Marshal. His head is rather bent, the expression of his countenance is severe, but at the same time not without a certain bonhomie. His brow is somewhat furrowed, but less you would say by years than by the cares and anxieties, the vigils and fatigues, of an active, eventful, and ambitious career. His step is firm, and when, as sometimes happens, it suddenly lengthens almost into a stride, you perceive that he still retains no small share of the vigour and elasticity of youth. This is Leopold O'Donnell, Count of Lucena, the Spaniard of Irish descent, who is now by far the first man in his country; who posseses a power confirmed by its duration (rare for a Spanish Premier of late years), and which certainly has the willing support of a greater majority of the nation than any of his predecessors for many years past could reckon upon.—Letter from Ceuta.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN DUTCH INDIA.—The great work of the emancipation of Dutch slaves in Java has begun. The plan adopted is modeled on the Act of 1834, which put emancipated negroes in the British colonies on the footing of apprenticed labourers. By a subsequent Act (1 Vic. c. 19) all apprenticeships were to cease after the 1st of August, 1840, but the colonial Legislatures passed Acts anticipating the day. In Java the apprenticeship is to last for six years, from the beginning of 1860 to 1866, after which date full liberty will be conceded. Owners receive 150 francs for slaves worth 1000 francs each, a rate which is looked upon as liberal. Slavery, we believe, does not exist in Java, where free labour is cheaper, but is common to all the rest of the Eastern Archipelago. Slaves, with the exception of those belonging to Kings, can inherit property and purchase their freedom. They are, like the old Roman slaves, of two classes—bondsmen for life, or bond-debtors who pay their debt by labour. The Government would seem desirous of gradually putting an end to the forced-labour system in Java. The holders of sugar contracts have been informed that they cannot receive aid from Government in cutting the cane crops. It is estimated that during the season, when the cane becomes ripe, 40,000 men per day are required on an average to cut it, and it is asserted that without the assistance of Government it will be impossible to procure so many men.—Allen's Indian Mail.

THE STORM OF OCTOBER 25.—Rear-Admiral Fitzroy explains the nature of the storm which wrecked the Royal Charter. Combining the various reports, he has ascertained it to have been a complete horizontal cyclone. Travelling bodily northward, the area of its sweep was scarcely 300 miles in diameter. While the central portion was advancing northward not uniformly, but at an average rate of about twenty miles an hour, the actual velocity of the wind, circling (as against watch hands) around a small "lull," was from 50 to 100 miles an hour. At places westward of its centre the wind appeared to "back," or "retrograde," shifting from east through north-east, and north to north-west; while at places eastward of its central passage the apparent change, or veering of the wind, was from east, through south-east, south, south-west, and west to north-west. Our Channel squadron, not far from the Eddystone, had a rapid—indeed, almost a sudden—shift from south-east to north-west, being in or near the central lull, while at Guernsey the wind veered round regularly. The sudden shift off the Eddystone occurred about three, or soon after, and about half-past five it took place near Reigate. From eastern parts of England the central portion of the storm moved northward and eastward, places on the east and north coasts of Scotland having strong easterly and northerly gales a day later than the middle of England. When the Royal Charter was wrecked, Elgin and Banffshire was not disturbed by wind. When it blew hard from east to north on that exposed coast, the storm had abated, or almost ceased in the Channel and on the south coast of Ireland.

A MAORI FESTIVAL IN NEW ZEALAND.—On the 1st of September a large gathering of natives took place at Waihenga, a small village situated on the right bank of Ruamahanga River, in the Wairarapa Valley. The chief Ngairo had erected a fine house, about sixty feet in length by thirteen in width, having boarded sides and bark roof, well ventilated, and ornamented in front with superb Maori carvings, well painted, and decorated with the brightest plumes—the huia, pigeon, and tui—and surmounted with the effigy of a Maori chief, elaborately tattooed, and holding in his upraised hand the badge of chieftainship—the Neremere club. In this hall Te Ngairo entertained to an ample Maori feast about four hundred of his race, and Wairarapa settlers, with their wives and daughters, to the number of about seventy. The tables were spread with clean white cloths and laid in the European style. The viands were undeniably good; and numerous waiters seemed to emulate each other in their attentions to their fair visitors. To prevent overcrowding, one party of guests were admitted at a time, who, when they were satisfied, moved out to make room for the next. The goodhearted old Ngairo was proud indeed of his white visitors, and justly so, as his tables were graced with the fairest flowers of the Wairarapa Valley. Captain Smith was requested to preside at their table, and our host apologised for the absence of wine, stating that it was in pursuance of a deliberate resolution of a meeting of his people held a few days prior to the feast. After the feast commenced the speeches, which continued with unabated animation till the following morning. The chief topic was the "Maori King Movement." Wi Tako came forward in the name of the King, but was met and strenuously opposed by Te Manihera, who is a man of considerable ability and an eloquent Maori orator. Feasting was the order of the following day; and as night came on the speechifying was resumed. It was continued throughout the whole night with increased animation, and was finally closed on the third day. The attempt to establish the banner of the King proved an utter failure. Te Manihera, who stuck to his British colours, carried a large majority of the meeting with him; and another large party professed themselves neutral, thus reducing the Kingites to a small minority. The most pleasing feature of the meeting was the cordiality which existed between the natives and the whites.—Australian Mail.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE FROM SHIPWRECK.—A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on Thursday, at its house, John-street, Adelphi—Thomas Chapman, Esq., F.R.S., in the chair. Rewards amounting to £142 were granted to the crews of the life-boats of the society stationed at Lytham, Thorpness, Barmouth, Yarmouth, Cahore, Rosslare, Filey, and other places, for rescuing a large number of persons from various wrecks during the heavy storms of last month. The silver medal of the institution was voted to C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., M.P., Chairman of the South Wales Railway; and to Mr. Williams, farmer, for wading into the surf, with others, at great peril, to the rescue of some of the crew of the brigantine Joseph Jean, of Jersey, which was totally wrecked on the Glamorganshire coast; also the silver medal to Henry Boyd, coastguard-boatman, for assisting to save, at much risk of life, and after three attempts in the shore-boat, the crew of eight men of the brig Water Lily, of Dublin, wrecked in Dundrum Bay on the 9th ult. Captain Ridge, R.N., stated that an additional life-boat was much wanted in that dangerous locality—a coastguard boat, with eight men in her, having been nearly lost the other day while attempting to reach a wreck there. The second-service clasp was also presented to Mr. W. Tregidgo, who had previously received the medal of the institution, chief officer of the Coast Guard at New Quay, Cornwall, for wading into the surf, often up to his neck, with others, and at much risk of life, to the rescue of the crews of eleven men of the French vessels Anais of Vannes, and the Union of St. Vaast. Several other rewards were afterwards granted for saving the lives of many shipwrecked crews during the late heavy gales. Four widows of gallant men, who, in attempting to save the lives of their fellow-creatures from an appalling death from shipwreck, had unfortunately perished themselves in their noble attempt, received from the institution a gratuity of £75. It was decided to order life-boats to be built for the Isle of Wight (two boats), North Berwick, and Elie. Others were ready to be sent to St. Andrews, Carmarthen Bay (where only last week a fearful wreck took place, with the narrow escape of fifteen men and the captain's wife), Porthcawl, Portrush, and Silloth. Miss Burdett Coutts had again offered to pay the cost of the last-named life-boat; and Messrs. Jaffray and Son, of St. Mildred's-court, had paid the cost of that for North Berwick. Payments amounting to £1366 were made for various life-boat establishments. The financial accounts of the institution for the past year were ordered to be sent to Mr. Begbie, the public accountant, who has been the auditor of the institution for many years past. T. B. Potter, Esq., of Manchester, having been elected a vice-president of the institution, in virtue of his munificent donation of £105 the proceedings closed.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, William Jones was convicted of attempting to murder one of the warders of the House of Correction, and sentence of death was recorded against him.

An extensive burglary was committed last Saturday at Mr. Thomas Reid's, gold and silver refiner, Skinner-street, Snow-hill. The stolen property consisted of gold, silver, diamonds, jewellery, and other property to a considerable amount.

BALL AT ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.—On Wednesday evening the annual Christmas ball of the patients in this noble charity took place in one of the large wings of the building, and passed off with the most marked success and spirit. The ballroom had been entirely decorated by the patients, who evinced the most lively interest in all relating to the festivity.

At the Royal Geographical Society on Monday next the following papers are to be read:—1. "Journey up the White Nile to the Equator and Travels in the Interior of Africa, in the years 1857-58." By Mr. J. Petherick, her Majesty's Consul at Khartum. 2. "Proposed Railway Route across the Andes from Caldera to Rosario, viâ Cordova." By Mr. William Wheelwright.

A meeting of Roman Catholics was held on Tuesday night at the Hanover-square Rooms, filled by 2000 persons, admitted by ticket. None of the leading Romanists were present; but some burning speeches were made in defence of the Pope's temporal power, and denouncing the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia as the authors of one of the most atrocious crimes in the invasion of Austrian Lombardy. An address of sympathy to the Pope was unanimously carried.

At the Thames Police Court a Leicester-square adventurer, named Auguste Gustave Gilson, is in custody on charge of conspiring to obtain valuable pictures from an artist at Brussels, named Schendell, by pretending that he was commissioned to purchase them for "Lord de Hadford," a title which will not be found in the peerage. One picture, "The General in Retirement," valued at 6000 francs, was sent by the duped artist. The confederate "Lord de Hadford" is not forthcoming.

THE GREAT BELL OF WESTMINSTER.—The action brought by Mr. Mears, the bell-founder, against Mr. E. B. Denison, came to a conclusion yesterday week in the Sheriff's Court, which was called upon to assess damages for the libel uttered by Mr. Denison in the matter of the Westminster bell. Mr. Denison said that Mears had supplied a bell with holes in it, stopped by mineral matter and washed over. The result was that Mr. Denison agreed to retract all his injurious animadversions on Mr. Mears, and to give him full indemnity for his expenses.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 1035 boys and 923 girls (in all 1958 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1849-58 the average number was 1595.——The effects of the recent severe cold, and probably also of violent change, are still more prominently developed in the return of deaths for last week than they were in that which preceded it. In the week that ended last Saturday the deaths of 1677 persons were recorded in London; in the two previous weeks there were respectively 1289 and 1548. In the ten years 1849-58 the average number of deaths in the ten weeks corresponding with last week was 1324.

In the Insolvent Debtors' Court, on Thursday, the case of Thomas Hawkins was brought to a conclusion by the learned Commissioner pronouncing judgment. The case has been repeatedly before the Court, and the opposition rested on two points—that the insolvent had vexatiously put the Saloon Omnibus Company, in which he was a shareholder, to considerable law expenses, and then made away with his property, he being a brushmaker at Bayswater, in order to prevent the creditors being paid for the costs occurred. The judgment was six months' imprisonment from the vesting order—on the 13th October last—for making away with property to prevent the costs being paid.

At the Central Criminal Court the trial of Hughes, the absconding bankrupt solicitor, occupied the whole of Wednesday and Thursday. The jury having found the prisoner "Guilty" on the first count—of absconding with intent to defraud—Hughes was again placed at the bar and charged with obtaining £570 from James Elems under fraudulent pretences, and a verdict of "Guilty" was found on this count also. The other counts were not proceeded with. Mr. Baron Martin, in strong terms commenting on the enormity of the offences of which the prisoner had been found guilty, sentenced him to one week's imprisonment in respect of the last charge, and ten years' penal servitude for his non-surrender under his bankruptcy.

FIRES AND RESCUE OF LIVES.—At a fire which broke out on Tuesday morning in the house of Miss Myers, in Houndsditch, the conductor of a fire-escape, on entering the first floor, found Mrs. Jane Mitchell, aged sixty-five years, in a state of insensibility. She being nearly fifteen stone weight, it was with difficulty that he succeeded in bringing her down. He again ascended and brought Kate Cantor, aged twenty-five, to the ground in safety.——On the same morning some persons passing a house in Norwood-place, Hackney-road, observed smoke issing from the lower part of the building. One got on the back of another and so reached the first-floor, when they rescued two children. Shortly afterwards Eilbeck, the fire escape conductor, arrived and rescued Mrs. Hart from the leads of the shop. The premises were destroyed.

THE HAMPSTEAD JUNCTION RAILWAY was opened on Monday for passenger traffic. This line commences by a junction with the North London Railway near the Camden-town station, and terminates by a junction with the North and South Western Junction Railway at Willesden, passing through Kentish-town by the foot of Highgate-hill to near Hampstead-heath, and across the Finchley and Edgeware roads, at each of which places substantial passenger stations have been erected. The Kew and Richmond trains to and from the North London Railway will in future pass over the new line, and thus avoid the use of any portion of the main line of the London and North Western Company. The principal work on the line is a tunnel three-quarters of a mile in length, passing under a portion of Hampstead-heath. There are four stations—viz., Kentish-town, Hampstead-heath, Finchley-road, and Edgeware-road. Twenty-three trains are to run each way to and from Fenchurch-street in the course of the day.

A CONFERENCE OF SCHOOLMASTERS was held on Tuesday for the purpose of considering the question of University local examinations. The feeling of the meeting was favourable to joint action on the part of the two Universities, and also to the holding of but one examination annually, and that to take place at all the centres simultaneously. It was further recommended that the Universities should take in turns the examination of senior and of junior candidates, that proficiency in religious knowledge should receive the same marks as other subjects, and that every junior candidate shall be at least in his fifteenth year. The discussions which preceded the adoption of the various resolutions were of a very interesting character.——The conference of schoolmasters resumed its sittings on Wednesday, when a resolution was passed recommending that the title of Associate of Arts should be given to every candidate who passed the Seniors' examination. A long discussion took place with regard to the title. Other resolutions were passed.

NEW REGULATIONS ON THE RIVER THAMES.—On Saturday (to-day) the new Watermen and Lightermen's Act comes into operation, under which some important regulations will be forthwith adopted on the River Thames. The new law has reference to watermen, bargeowners, and others connected with the navigation of the river Thames between Teddington-lock, in Middlesex and Surrey, and Lower Hope Point, near Gravesend. It has also reference to "Passengers' Boats" on the river, including sailing and steam vessels. The Watermen's Company have additional powers conferred on them, and are to hold quarterly courts. The Court is to appoint "Sunday watermen," and to regulate all fares, and the Corporation of Gravesend is to appoint Sunday watermen for that place. No Sunday ferries are to be appointed within 200 yards of Vauxhall-bridge, and the watermen of Westminster have their rights preserved as to Sunday hiring. All boats are to be registered and numbered. There are several new regulations as to apprentices. By-laws are to be made respecting the traffic on the river, and penalties to be enforced by the Lord Mayor and other magistrates for the due performance of the navigation of the Thames. The act contains as many as 103 provisions.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S NEW TABERNACLE.—On Monday evening the friends of Mr. Spurgeon held a meeting at New Park-street Chapel, with the view of presenting their pastor with a New-Year's offering towards the completion of the new Tabernacle. A report was read by Mr. Cook, the honorary secretary, of the receipts and expenditure since the commencement of the undertaking, from which it appeared that the amount already collected was only sufficient to answer about one-half the requirements for the completion of the building. The sum of £9000 was already absorbed in the purchase of the ground and for other purposes. More than 100 men were constantly employed, and the walls were rapidly rising. There was still at the banker's £8000; but, when it was taken into consideration that at least £30,000 would be needed by the time the building was finished, it would be at once seen that there must be no lack of energy on the part of the friends of Mr. Spurgeon till the money that was wanted was obtained. The gentleman who gave £3000 on the laying of the first stone had forwarded to the secretary an intimation that he would give £2000 more. Several gentlemen addressed the meeting, very warmly advocating the work, and remarked that it was truly surprising that so large a sum should have been collected in so short a time by the followers of this popular preacher. It is confidently hoped that by the end of this year the Tabernacle will be finished and opened for public service entirely free from debt.

The recent great cold has been followed by as remarkable a warmth, considering the season. On Sunday at noon the temperature was 56·1 deg., the highest recorded in January for seventeen years.

LITERATURE.

SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSEHOLD WORDS. Griffith and Farran.

This is a selection from the "words of the immortal bard," illuminated by Samuel Stanesby. A more superb and more elaborately ornamented little volume has not issued from that fairy factory of books which is put in requisition at November and December of each year. We have seen and heard of missals whose rich colouring and gorgeous gilding would lead the eye to ache if it dwelt too long upon them, and here we have something of that kind reproduced, but with the advantage of such a careful and skilful distribution of hues that one may gaze as long as one pleases without any of the inconveniences above alluded to. The frontispiece is a copy of the Shakespeare head of Shakespeare imbedded in a frame of dead gold; the titlepage is a rich and fanciful design; as each page contains an illuminated and ornamental frame, wreath which the "household words" are set, and the whole is divided from the others by a thin coloured line. The only defect we can detect is that the letterpress is somewhat hidden and coarse, but in other respects this is the very pearl of ornamented gift-books.

MORAL EMBLEMS, WITH APHORISMS AND PROVERBS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS, from JACOB CATS and ROBERT FARIBLE: with Illustrations. Longmans.

Designs found in their Works, by JOHN LEIGHTON, F.S.A.; the whole Translated and Edited, with Additions, by RICHARD PIGOT. Longmans.

In contributing to the volumes of Jacz which belong to the present publishing season Messrs. Longman have taken high ground. The work before us will address itself with every accessory of forces to the student and the bibliopolist. Probably to these two classes alone the names of Jacob Cats and Robert Farible are known, and not to many of them familiar. The former, an eminent Dutch jurisconsult and statesman, who filled for several years the post of Grand Pensionary and Chief Magistrate of Middleburg and Dordrecht, was born at Brouwersaan, in the Isle of Schouwen, province of Zeeland on the 10th of November, 1577. Educated for and adopting the profession of the law, which he studied both at Leyden and in France, he applied himself with little success assiduity to poetry, and not only became distinguished among the literati of that age for the purity and elegance of his Latin verses, but soon took rank as one of her first lyrists in his native tongue. In pursuit of health he travelled, and visited England, spending some time at Oxford and Cambridge. He was eventually promoted to the rank of State Counsellor and Grand Pensionary of the province of West Friesland, and made Keeper of the Great Seal of Holland. After filling these important offices for eighteen years he retired; but subsequently consented to form part of an embassy sent to England to arrange a treaty of commerce between the two countries. He then retired wholly into private life, and devoted himself to the muse until the advanced age of eighty-three, when he expired, almost with a pen in his hand. During the period that Cats flourished ecclesiastical literature was assiduously cultivated by men of learning in almost every country of Europe, and used as a medium for the diffusion of the precepts of Christian morality. The "Moral Emblems" of Cats, which form a series of the most admirable compositions of this class which any language can boast, are accordingly remembered by poets, and at the same time afford a singular proof of the capabilities of the Dutch language, differing as it did, both in orthography and idiom, from the Dutch of the present day; and it was by the production mainly that he first established his fame as a classical writer, as an amiable moralist, and a popular poet. He was peculiarly fortunate in having for his illustrator, for illustration was ever the handmaid of this school of literature, an artist whose excellence was such as to cause his designs to be the subject of careful study by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the works of Cats and the drawings of Adrian van de Venne are thus inseparably connected.

The attempt to render a work of this kind familiar to the English reader is worthy of every acknowledgment; while the blending with it a very rare and almost equally unknown collection of Latin and English poems and epistolary products, of which Robert Farible, a Scotsman, was the author, and which was published in London in 1638, a contemporary as it does to the completeness of the whole object in view. It need hardly be said that everything which the skill and taste of Mr. Leighton in the designs and illustrations, and all that the industry in the production of this splendid volume, could effect is lavishly spread through every part of the volume.

We have selected one of the subjects for illustration. It is entitled "The Biter Bitten," the description of which runs thus :—

> Cats by an air, the summer ayres
> An oyster lying on the strand,
> Gaping with open shell I ishale
> The summer breeze from off the land.
> To seize the luscious morsel quite
> With sudden swoop and deadly pick,
> The sea-bird darts his hungry beak
> Between the oyster's shell;
> Closing on it entraps its thought,
> The bird is by the oyster caught!
> And slipped so tight and well:
> That strive and struggle as he may,
> To free his beak and get away
> He keeps him captive, firmly bound,
> Till the return of tide he's drowned.
> Who to themselves would all appropriate
> Of blessings, deserve the mariner's fate;
> Nor doth he fail to meet it, soon or late,
> Whose nose is thrust in everybody's plate.

THE BITER BITTEN.

PICTURES OF SPORTING LIFE AND CHARACTER. By LORD WILLIAM LENNOX. Hurst and Blackett.

This indefatigable littérateur is once more in the field, with a well-filled budget of sporting observations. Not content with the incidents of "Forty-and-two Clubs, and the Road," he takes a much wider range, and fishing, wildfowl-shooting, sledging, yachting, curling, &c., in short, every item of the mainly sport meets with due notice at his hands. There are few sports in which, during his Lordship's career, he has not participated with a light heart and a nimble foot and hand. Perhaps if he has one especial predilection it is for the old Driving Club, and he takes us right back to the days when Purkis, the 5th Hawks head-bearer, the Hatter bearing-hook, and the Rogers ring were all the fashion; and when it was Mr. Charles Buxton's delight, as president, to marshal his followers, and lead them—with that tattivee-and-a-half inches deep, those corded silk plush smallclothes, that bouquet nearly as big as a warming-pan, and those sixteen strings and rosettes to each knee—behind his four bays through many a merry afternoon. All these paraphernalia have died away; the barouches are no longer bright yellow, hung high, with arms and crests on the door-panels; and Lord William gives it as his opinion that the present teams are as much superior to the old as gas-lets to the dim oil rays under which the charleys sneezed on their street watch. Racing is also one of his Lordship's great themes; and, as a matter of course, the springy turf of Goodwood, which he first trod as a boy, has due honour paid to it. The old Tom Grant, the Duke's huntsman, he has also a pleasant word; and among the cap and scarlet heroes, "all of the present time," Harry Ayris seems to be his favourite. Of yachting he also speaks from a long and rich experience; and fishing has an excellent notice in the last hundred pages. It is always well to make a good finish, and we cannot help wishing that all the book had been written on the same plan, and the different subjects kept more separate. Of course a sporting man's life is not all fish, and the concluding portion of the chapters are somewhat too varied, and the transition from one subject to another rather too sudden. Such a mode of treatment is wearying to many readers, as well as a waste of strength in the author. The volume we have before us is very neatly got up, and embellished with engravings of Hounds Running and Partridge-shooting.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

The Cornhill.—Probably to meet the impatience which was undoubtedly felt and expressed among the reading public, the first number of this magazine anticipated the usual moment of publication by nearly a fortnight, and the favourable opinions expressed in quarters which ventures to include this serial in its ordinary notices at the present time may seem a little out of date. Nevertheless, some advantage may be derived from a few words of comment. The pseudo-enthusiasm which may have been created by the circumstances under which it has been produced, and which was calculated to place it at once on the "high topgallant" of public favour, will have evaporated, and a more sober judgment of its merits as a whole is more likely to have been formed. It is in this spirit that we feel called upon to say that, looking to the contents of the first number as indicating the class and character of the magazine, there can be no doubt that it has fulfilled every requirement and every expectation. It is in no depreciatory sense that we hasard the opinion that the standard set up is not of the highest. What we mean is that there is an exact adherence to the matter to the title. The Cornhill is a magazine as distinguished from a review. Taking it as a specimen of days when novels are published at the rate of two hundred volumes a year, it is not wholly an unuseful task to bring prominently before us those writers who founded and built the solid portions of that class of literature which is now crumbling away and tottering to its shelf; and this is done neat-handedly in the article "British Novelists" as represented by Richardson, Miss Austen, and Scott. "The Shakespearean Discovery," which was to be Mr. Collier's efforts to emasculate our great poet, but which has brought down upon the head of that Tarpeia, is treated in a very polite and fair spirit, the evidence being weighed with the practised skill of a lawyer and a police magistrate of experience, whose latitude we recognise at the foot of the article. In his "Conversations with Prince Metternich" there are symptoms that Major Noel was not exempt from the influence which that highly-accomplished diplomatist (for to that character he was entitled, whoever may be inclined to question his statesmanship) is reported to have exercised on all or most of those who came within its sphere. It is, we believe, not generally known, as is here related, that Metternich was a cautious believer in the doctrines of phrenology, and examined with his eye the heads of those persons whom he employed confidentially or about his person. Mr. Peacock continues and concludes the "Memoirs of Shelley," the first part of which appeared in the magazine in June, 1858. A new interest will be given to Twickenham as a "Literary Suburb" amongst those who learn for the first time the great names and cons of the Sour Canal question are ably debated; a new story is commenced, which goes cheerfully enough; and a continuation of "Holmby House" and a second paper "On the Solution of the Gold Question" make up a rather fuller number than usual.

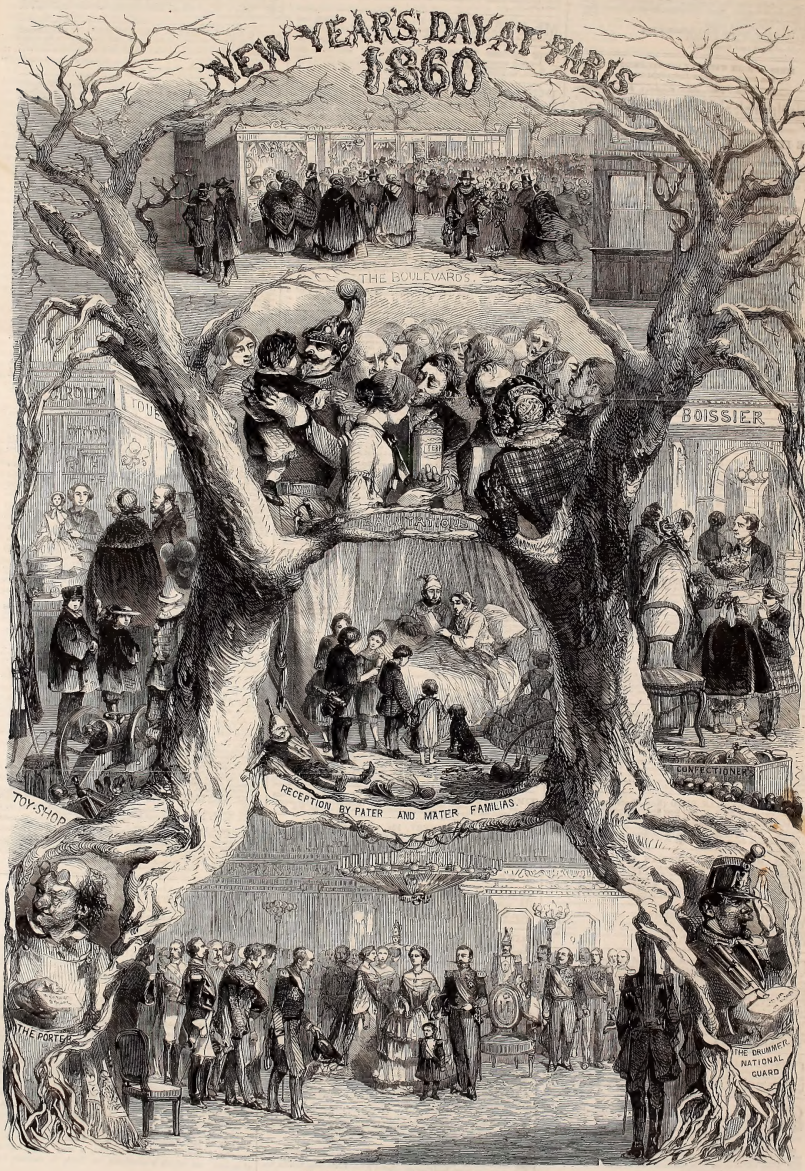
Blackwood.—Under the title of "St. Stephen's" we have the first of three parts of a poem in which "it is intended to give succinct sketches of our principal Parliamentary characters, commencing with the origin of Parliamentary oratory (in the Civil Wars) and closing with the present time." The plan and something of the execution would indicate that this is the work of a writer who, supposes as a novelist, has achieved his best claim to poetical honours by two satirical poems which are still remembered and used in the regions of quotation. On the whole, however, the verses are so very little above those which might be produced by a successful competitor for an Oxford prize poem, that we feel that we ought to reject the notion above stated. "Mystery and unintelligibility have in all ages been the grand resources of those who wished to impose upon the gullibility of the world and to pass for being wiser than their neighbours. Quacks in medicine, mock-moral, quacks political, and quacks literary, have resorted to them as the best means to make medical and quacks legal; and nowhere will they be found in greater abundance than in the murderous tome with which, after years of labour, Mr. Ruskin burdens our groaning table." From this specimen guess the mode in which Mr. Ruskin's "Elements of Drawing" is dealt with. There is a smack of the old scourge which Maga in her time has wielded so trenchantly in this article which is quite worthy of the days of Lockhart and Wilson in its handling. The critical and satirical vein is equally paramount in the very next page, where the modern French novel is shown up with that basis of real likeness which is essential to caricature, but with an extravagance which the subject demands, in a tale designated "The Last French Novel." There is a stanzism in the amusing story which is nearly a parallel to the famous fit of hair of dozen characters in "The Critic." "Rambles at Random in the Southern States" is agreeably written, and is sufficiently descriptive and graphic; and Captain Sir Leopold M'Clintock's "Voyage of the Fox in the Arctic Seas" is reviewed. The most grave and didactic paper is that on "The Public Service," which argues the merits of financial and administrative reform from a broad and national point of view. Fiction is represented by a continuation of "The Luck of Ladysmede," and by the commencement of a new tale, "Norman Sinclair; an Autobiography." On the whole, this is a very valuable number, inasmuch as its contents are varied, its subjects well chosen, and their treatment not in the least tinged with party views.

The Universal Review.—An attempt, and, as we think, a successful one, has been made in this review to render intelligible to public comprehension what the Exoteuser in this country has been and is. With much evidence of research, and the consequent colouration of a good deal of curious matter relating to an institution which, in its inception, its growth, and its changes and modifications, is full of interest, there is interwoven narrative and anecdote sufficient to render the paper as easy of perusal to the sofa-lounging reader as it is to the historical student. In his review of "The Diaries and Correspondence of George Rose" no doubt Dr. Doran found himself on kindred ground; and the process of inducement to read the work itself, which is, or ought to be, the object of reviews, is cunningly and dalefully carried out. Adhering to the principle on which this serial was founded, and which he has ever entertained, Deus Mundus, a modicum of fiction is again introduced, and a new tale by Mr. Jeaffreson is commenced, and therefore evidence is given that it will be built up by no "Frankenstein." Mr. Ramsay's "Lord Dundonald" has a singular claim to novelty in the treatment of its subject, for a great deal has been done to rescue that remarkable man from the wholesale imputations of recklessness and want of principle in money matters which he has ever entertained. The view of his career here taken and worked out will go far to establish a theory which, some years ago, the writer of these lines might be made one of the most pathetic stories there was written. The fitness of things could hardly be better illustrated than by the selection of Mr. Ramsay's subject for Lord Dundonald's autobiography. As these notices are intended as indicators, and not as indexes, we shall leave the mingling of the utile with the dulce which ought to characterise a magazine skilfully and abundantly effected in this first number for the new year.



Macmillan's Magazine.—It surely must be the highest faculty of poetry to make music out of common things, as we once answered to an argument that Pope was not a poet, that he wrought poetry out of the most prosaic of subjects—those of cards. No doubt there are elements of pathos in the story of the history of the brief seaside holiday of a poor girl with a wife failing and a child withering beneath the influences of a London atmosphere; but what of the imaginative or the metrical is associated with mining shares at a discount? Nevertheless, Mr. Sympson, in his "Dark Dreams," has idealised even such a pure realism as that. Here is a picture of the fraudulent dealer in shares as he appears when asked for "accounts":—

> "The books, the books! but he could not wait,
> Bound on a matter of life and death:
> When the great Books (see Daniel seven, the tenth)
> Were open, O, I and mine as well!
> And then began to blast himself and once
> All over with the inflectionless curse,
> That makes the widow lean. 'My dearest friend,
> Have faith, have faith! We live by faith,' said he;
> 'And all things work together for the good
> Of them that love the Lord.' And so spoke he,
> Grips my hand hard, and with God-bless-you went.

Of course the Laureate's contribution will open the number at the month on the high tide of demand; but there is plenty of excellent matter besides. It is a good sign that, not trusting to the ballooning of the current number by Mr. Tennyson, such marks of care should be found in the other articles. "Tom Brown at Oxford" expands a little, and there is the very amusement to be found in the paper called "Scientific Hoaxes."

The Dublin University, the New Monthly, Bentley, the Cornhill, and Macmillan have all been noticed separately, and some more effective and some less. The most noticeable article in the Dublin is that on "The Improbability of a War with France." The Constitutional is happy from its own point of view on "A Look Back."

The Art-Journal gives us an exquisite engraving, by Vernon, of Winterhalter's portrait of "Lady Constance Grosvenor," which, with W. P. Frost's "Una," engraved by Lightfoot, are the selections from the Society of British Artists' exhibition. By W. Holl, of Raphael's "Bearing the Cross" is the third-page illustration. It may be fancy, but there seems to be more pains than usual, if that be possible, taken in the execution of these illustrations. As any rate the result is very striking.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1860.

THE project of the Government for the establishment of a volunteer reserve of seamen has been so universally accepted that it seems to have been adopted as a settled addition to the institutions of the country. After the first ackowledgment of its value little or no comment or observation on the subject has been made in the public prints on the subject. This is, no doubt, a strong indication in favour of the system; for it is quite certain that if its policy was considered questionable, or its details faulty, there would have been enough and to spare of criticism bestowed upon the plan. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed for the formation of any opinion as to the success of the scheme, and no announcement of its probable or actual effect on the seamen of the mercantile marine has been made. It is with satisfaction, however, that we are able to invite attention to a step which has been taken by a company that has in its service a very large number of sailors, and which is calculated, we think, to exercise some influence in this matter among the shipowning body. The Peninsular and Oriental Company has addressed a circular to the seamen in their employ, making known to those among them who are qualified to avail themselves of the advantages to be derived from enrolment in the reserve force the conditions on which the directors are willing to enable them to do so. It is pointed out that the service required being to undergo a drill in gunnery practice, a ship will be stationed by the Admiralty for that purpose near Southampton, and the seamen having the choice of of either attending for the whole twenty-eight days in a year appointed for the drill at once, or dividing it into portions of a week at a time, the men in the company's service may conveniently perform the duty during the intervals in which their ships stay in port. With the view of enabling enrolled seamen to add the pay of this reserve service to their wages in that of the company, and thus directly benefit themselves to the extent of between £8 and £9 a year, exclusive of the pension they will be entitled to after a certain time of duty, the directors have ordered that the pay of the company shall not be deducted from their wages during the time they may be absent on drill, provided the drill be taken during the stay of the company's ship in port.

This is not only a theoretical adhesion to the principle of the volunteer reserve on the part of an important section of the mercantile marine, but a practical assistance to its working, inasmuch as every facility is afforded to a body of excellent sailors for enrolment in the proposed force. Beyond this, special encouragement is held out to the men to join this truly national body, for they are told officially by their employers that, as the reserve force of 50,000 seamen now about to be enrolled, and the numerous corps of volunteer riflemen now forming himself out the country, will form such a means of defence as to render unlikely any foreign attack, the chance of those who compose the reserve being ever required for active service is very remote; their duty is considered to be rather that of a means of preserving peace: and that, therefore, the members of the Reserve Force of Naval Volunteers are likely to enjoy their additional pay and pensions without any further risk or trouble to themselves than the supposition of the comparatively short time they are required to exercise, or it may be said amuse, themselves at gunnery practice.

Every inducement is thus presented to these particular seamen to enter into this special service. To say nothing of the patriotic spirit they will exhibit, the advantage of pay and pension they will enjoy, they have displayed before them the prospect of a yearly holiday and the periodical indulgence of that desire for change, however slight, which is a marked feature in the idiosyncrasy of the sailor. If the example set by this company is followed by the bulk of the mercantile marine, the vexed problem as to how the Navy can be readily and effectively manned will be as nearly solved as possible.

Despite the recalcitration of the small despotisms, it is inapprehable that they will prevent the Congress from meeting But, whether it meet or do not, the legitimate hopes of Italy daily strengthen. If the Council assemble, it is under conditions that nullify the Emperor's intrigues; and, if it does not assemble, that freedom remains a noble fact, and in need of no assistance from the apis, anser, et vitulus—the wax, pen, and parchment which have been said to govern the world. The Emperor's attitude is that of pretending to expose himself in order to draw the harmless fire of the antagonists—the wearers of the trained artillery. man who has caught a spice of boahranging finsse :—

He hung his "pamphlet" on a bush, and hit himself thereby;
The dupes rejoiced at his disaster, and at the bush let fly.

Having completely explained, through M. de la Guerronière, what are the Imperial views for Central Italy, the Emperor could well allow the aggrieved Pope and his friends to denounce the pamphlet, and could then affirm, with as much truthfulness as is usually the meaning of protesting that the book has been not an official programme. This important affirmation given, what right have the Ambassadors and Envoys to say any more about the pamphlet than about any other that may be in the windows of the Palais Royal? It will not the less are all the Powers and all the peoples made to understand that the Emperor takes the course pointed out by England to the extent of refusing to interfere, or to permit any one else to interfere, for the restoration of the priest who has been well called the Pretender to the dominion of Romagna. The question of Northern Italy is a more open one. The Emperor talks to Ambassadors of his respect for "acquired rights;" but he is a master of New-Year phrase, and may mean that he respects the right which Europe now recognises—that of the Sardinian King to the new rulers. But whether an assent will be given by France to the aggregation of the small kingdoms into a grand quadrilateral that might defend Italy against all comers has to be seen. All that is certain is that the prohibition of outward interference holds good there as in regard to Central Italy So stand matters at the opening of 1860—Italy in a more hopeful and France in a more honourable, position than they had occupied a many a year; while the enraged Priest-King, whose temporalities are so sorely endangered, is alternately indulging in "holy horror" (in the form of communications) and in appeals to outlying adventurers to come in, armed, and protect him against his affectionate children.

At home the new year opens very quietly. Englishmen seem to have little to think of just now except charity, hospitality, and ride-practice. Of course there are as yet more stirring, although we are within three weeks of the next Session. Ministers have not filled up the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Fitzroy, but there is a sort of impression that the Chief Commissionership will be supplied in a mere official "from the upwards," and that no new man will be taken into office, though one would think that Lord Palmerston would be glad to enlist a smart debater in aid of the coming Reform Bill. Of this measure nothing is permitted to be heard. Mr. Cardwell could tell nothing about it to his Oxonian fellow-Druids, and is too conscientious a man to expose himself, by invention, to a classic quotation—

In yonder cave a Druid lies.

There seems to be a tacit understanding that if Lord John Russell will take care not to go too far he shall have Conservative protection against those who want him to go a great deal farther, and that the grave lesson taught by the "strike," when masses enrolled themselves to promote by force the adoption of a false economy, will be used to the utmost use in the struggle. Mr. Potter will be played off against Mr. Bright, and the country will be asked whether even its National Debt will be respected by the pupils of the strike agitators, should those pupils be admitted to political power? Statesmanlike tact, rather than enlarged views, appears to be the sine qud non for passing a Reform Bill that shall set the question at rest for a quarter of a century.

To the heavy loss which England sustained when the year was within a few hours of its setting, it will we make but a word of reference here. Lord Macaulay has died, in the full vigour of his magnificent faculties, and in the full hales of his enviable renown; and on Monday he will be laid in the venerable Abbey, round which cluster a thousand memories which he, more than any other man, has illustrated and rendered perpetual.

A broad shadow from the Atlantic has fallen on the various complications of the Italian question have been taken into consideration. The capture of Schamyl and the submission of Circassia have given Russia the triumph for which she has so long waited, and another item may be added to the schedule of compliances with the will of Peter the Great. Dorchester our Indian Minister has his eye on the map of Western Asia. The Sultan is still in a helpless condition. He knows and feels that reforms must come; but how they are to be brought about in a country where nearly all the leading men have got to know, and envy of them both, is a problem beyond the enfeebled brain of the Grand Signior. Meantime his vassal of Egypt is bewildered with the isthmus question. which France presses and England frowns upon Ismail Pasha, the Governor, we come to Morocco, and find the Spaniards urging their holy war with little success, and the best excuses are supplied for them by competent authority, and it is said that we are shortly to hear of a sudden and dashing exploit, when the banners of Santiago will be planted in triumph on the walls of Fez. Meanwhile the Great Queen Isabella Segunda has recently given birth to a Princess in a fact that doubtless has interest in her Palace. From France, Congressional matters apart, there is no news at all—even the gossiping Paris Correspondence does not seem to have completely carried out her meritorious edict against the pernicious employment of the ladies of 1859, whose pictures will remind our posterity of the dialogue in one of Sir Bulwer Lytton's novels :—"And I am like Mars, am I?" said the beauty, opening the door. "Why! "Because," said the artist, closing the canvas. "And because," said I, as the door closed after her, "thanks to your hoop, you cover nine acres of ground." And so we may once more cross Le Manche, noting, however, that our American cousins cannot as yet agree upon a President, and therefore cannot receive the President's message, though it is printed in the New York papers and occupies boxes; noting, too, that the grand Canadian bridge—the grandest thing of its kind in the world—has been opened in the year that took from us the creator of that marvellous structure, Robert Stephenson.

A few sympathy-cum-Pope meetings are scarcely worth recording. We shall not repeal the Catholic Emancipation Act because a few Catholics in England and a good many in Ireland are too idiotic to comprehend the true position of freemen. The demonstrations are very helpless. Europe has had a long laugh at the blockheads who set about collecting money for a sword for Marshal M'Mahon because he was thought to be a probable invader of England, but have stuck in the middle of their enterprise, partly from the ridicule which has chiefly because the Marshal's master has given offence to their master, the Pope, by Denunciation by the bench and by the press of the spy system, recently adopted as a regular means of getting evidence in divorce and other cases, will be hope, be needless at this date in 1861 by the disgust Englishmen will have naturally felt at the system, and by the transportation of a spy or two who may have carried seal to the point of perjury. The "Song of the Bell" has been set anew in a court of law, and Mr. Denison's original mistake of not making certain vicious laws be enabled in his having to pay Messrs. Mears very heavy costs in their efforts to obtain damages for slander. But we have no bell. Perhaps its chimes will introduce the next new year. Both at Manchester and Birmingham provincial meetings have been held that music does not really civilise without other aid, for there has been a disgraceful riot in a concert-hall in each place, because a greedy and dishonest audience insisted on forcing a singer through twice the quantity of music they had paid to hear. Mr. Sims Reeves was the vocalist, and his gallant resistance to tyranny was very meritorious. With a regret that the Duke of Cambridge should begin the new year with such a blunder in the disposal of patronage as that at which his very taxbordinates shrug their shoulders—the General Ashburnham appointment—we close our new year's summary.

LORD JOHN SCOTT died at his seat, Cawston Lodge, near Rugby, on Tuesday morning. His Lordship was a keen supporter of our national sports, particularly the turf and the chase.

NATIONAL LIFE BOAT INSTITUTION.—During the year 1859 the life-boats of the Royal National Life-boat Institution were at various points of our coasts actively called into operation on sixty-two different occasions, the result being that they saved 197 lives from thirty wrecks, besides assisting five vessels safely into port. The Royal National Life-boat Institution has now ninety-two life-boat stations under its management. On an average, each station requires £19 a year to maintain it in a state of thorough efficiency. This good work can only be perpetuated by permanent endowments and the continued support of the public to the National Life-boat Institution.—The Life-boat Journal.

THE COURT.

On New-Year's Eve the Queen had a small dinner and evening party at Windsor Castle.

On Sunday (New-Year's Day) her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, the Indian and gentlemen of the Court, and the 4 maids of honour attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Duchess of Kent and the Prince and Princess of Leiningen were also at the service. The Rev. and Very Rev. Dr. Wellesley officiated. In the evening the Duchess of Kent and the Prince and Princess of Leiningen dined with the Royal family.

On Monday her Majesty's annual distribution of food and clothing to about 600 poor persons of the Windsor and Clewer parishes took place in the riding-house of the Castle. At ten o'clock the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Princess Royal, Prince Leopold, Princess Alice, Prince Helena, Princess Louisa, and Princess Beatrice, and attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting, proceeded to the riding-house to witness the distribution, which was under the direction of the Rev. the Very Rev. the Provost of Eton, the Clergy of Windsor and Clewer, and the district visitors for the relief of the poor. The numbers of the Queen's Club (established under her Majesty's patronage) received at the same time articles of clothing, according to the amount of their contributions (as at former occasions), in the additions provided by her Majesty. After the distribution the Queen, with the Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, walked in the Home Park, and visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Helena, walked and drove in the Home Park. Princess Alice rode in the morning. On Wednesday the Prince Consort went to Cambridge, attended by Major-General the Hon. C. Grey and Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby, and presided at a meeting of the committee of the Council of the Fitzwilliam Museum. On Thursday, at South Kensington, Her Royal Highness the Princess Frederick William of Prussia arrived at the Castle—Earl and Countess De Grey and Ripon in full Court dress. Soon after arrived Prince Ralph Lucy, M.P., and Mrs. Gladstone. The Royal dinner party included the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, the Earl and Countess of Clarendon, Lord Wodehouse, the Exchequer, Major-General the Hon. R. Bruce, Captain Grey, and the visitors were admitted to the evening party.

On Wednesday the garrison of Windsor, consisting of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, and the 2nd battalion Scots Fusilier Guards, paraded in the quadrangle of the Castle to witness the ceremony of the presentation of new Victoria Crosses by her Majesty to officers and men. The Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, and the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Frederick William of Prussia arrived shortly before o'clock. Her Majesty was attended by the Duke of Cambridge, Colonel Commanding the Household Brigade; the Right Hon. Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, Secretary of State for War; Earl de Grey Under Secretary for War; the Adjutant-General, Major-General Sir J. Lysons; Major-General Sir Augustus Clifford; Major-General Sir Edward Lugard; Rear-Admiral the Hon. Sir H. Keppel, K.C.B., Groom in Waiting. The Royal Princesses of Prussia were attended by Lady Augusta Bruce, Lady Caroline Barrington, the Hon. Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby, and Captain Grey. The Queen was attended by Major-General the Hon. R. Bruce and Captain Grey, and the Prince Consort by Her Majesty was received with a Royal salute after which the presentation of the crosses took place. The troops then marched past their Majesties a second time, then wheeled into line, presented arms, and returned to their barracks. After the troops had left the quadrangle her Majesty, attended by the Princesses of Prussia, Princess Alice, and Prince Frederick William of Prussia, proceeded to the Curfew Tower, and Prince Louisa went to Claremont in order to visit the Countess de Neuilly.

The Earl of Caithness has succeeded Lord Talbot de Malahide as Lord-in-Waiting to her Majesty. Viscount Bury and the Hon. Emily Cadogan have succeeded the Hon. Eleanor Stanley and the Hon. Emily Cadogan as Maids of Honour in Waiting to her Majesty. Colonel F. H. Seymour and Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby have succeeded Major-General the Hon. C. Grey and Captain De Tuyl as Equerries in Waiting to the Queen and Prince Consort. Captain Grey succeeds Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby as Equerry in Waiting to the Prince of Wales.

The Duke of Devonshire and Lady Louisa Cavendish have left Holker Hall, Westmoreland, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland at Trentham Hall, Staffordshire.

Viscount Palmerston arrived in London on Tuesday morning from Broadlands, and returned the same evening. His Lordship will give a grand full dress Parliamentary banquet on Monday next, at Cambridge House, to the Peers, Members, and a large party of the leading supporters of the Government in the House of Commons.

His Excellency Lord Cowley, British Minister at the Imperial Court of the Tuileries, arrived at Dover on Monday on a visit to the Queen.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. John Lamb, M.A. Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, has been appointed Christian Lecturer for the year 1860.

We are requested to state that the Bishop of London will resume his usual Tuesday levees for the clergy at Fulham on Tuesday next, January 10, from eleven till two o'clock.

The new Chancellor of London has been presented with a handsome testimonial by his old parishioners and friends at Gateshead. In the handsome parish church of Gateshead-with-Heworth, these have presented a handsome silver salver to the widow of the late Rev. A. H. Ashe, their deceased Rector, "in a memorial of respect."

St. Peter's Church, Foston, near Dranham, has recently been reopened after restoration. The parish church at King's Langley, Herts, was reopened on Wednesday, the 21st of December, after three months of great improvements. The church of Crathie has lately undergone considerable repairs and internal decoration.

The workmen who have been employed in the renovation of Twickenham Church, several of whom have joined together in the national school-room yesterday week, the interior having been provided by contributions of the parishioners, and by the neighbouring gentry. The Duchess Dowager of Northumberland provided a baron of beef weighing 112 lbs., and a proportionate plum-pudding weighing 15 lbs.

The following is the list of preachers at the special services at St. Paul's Cathedral for the current month :—Sunday, January 8 (to-morrow), the Rev. Daniel Moore, Incumbent of Christ Church, Greenwich, second Boyle Lecturer; on the 11th, the Rev. A. Boyd, Incumbent at Paddington, Canon of Gloucester; and the Rev. Richard Cecil Vaughan, Canon Residentiary, and late Head Master of Harrow; and on the 29th, the Rev. Dr. Whewell, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

The Worcester papers announce the intention of Miss Lavender, of Barbourne, to erect at her own cost, a district church, with a churchyard, on ground lying at a short distance to the north from the former turnpike-gates. The church is intended for the accommodation of the increasing populations of that district lying north of Barbourne-brook and Bowling-house, and where there is a population of 1950 persons. In addition to building the church, Miss Lavender proposes endowing it to the extent of £150.

In the week preceding Christmas, a stained-glass window, by Hannan, was placed in the north wall of the chancel of St. Mary's Church. An entirely new window has lately been added by the Rector to the nave of Willingdale Doe Church, Essex. The windows are of stained glass, with lights and tracery, was last week erected in the east end of Moore Church, Lanchesbury. A memorial of much higher design has been placed in the Collegiate Church, late of Cumbrae, by the founder, the clergy, and the students, in memory of the first rector and principal of the Scottish university there, the late William Anstruther Robertson, youngest son of W. Robertson, Esq., of Kindeace, Ross-shire.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

The compilers of the Annual Register for 1859 (that very useful publication was born just one century since, under the noble intellect of Edmund Burke) will have to record in the first volume of its second centenary no greater loss to letters than that of Thomas Babington Macaulay—we drop Lordships when we write of really great men. Macaulay dead! What has not History lost in the year 1859! Hallam gone—but Hallam had outlived his noble intellect; and then Macaulay dead, who had not outlived his still more noble intellect. Losing Hallam and Macaulay in one year is something like losing a Gibbon and a David Hume in one year. The world of letters has not been more taken by surprise or thrown into more unaffected mourning since the year 1824 announced the death of another noble author—and that author Byron. The world had been prepared for the death of Walter Scott. Wherever the English language is spoken, all who read were not surprised to learn that Southey, and Wordsworth, and Campbell were no more. We had been tutored into a belief that Macaulay was to remain among us for at least two more volumes of his great History. It seems to be the lot of English historians of note to leave unfinished what they have sought so long to accomplish. Fox left us a torso, Mackintosh a leg and arm, Macaulay an unfinished head. Those three Whig historians never weighed and balanced what they were about like Hume and Gibbon. And why? They were too discursive; they attempted too much. Fox was fat with indolence in using ink; Mackintosh began too late; and Macaulay spaced out English history into volumes that no labour such as man possesses could fulfil to his own satisfaction. Gibbon is the rare instance in literature of a writer well to do in the world conceiving an epic of history and carrying it out to the last in the way that Homer executed his "Iliad," and Fielding his "Tom Jones." Gibbon has beginning, middle, and end. If the Edinburgh Review was the first great cause of making Macaulay an inimitable Essayist, it was the Edinburgh Review that made Macaulay what he was not—but might have been—the very first of English historians.

In all that Macaulay wrote, even in his boyish beginnings, we find those brilliant flashes, not of silence (as Sydney Smith observed in a waggish moment), but of assertion which lend a grace—a passing grace—to his manner and his style. He was a desperate assertor. What Lord Melbourne said of him was true of him from first to last. "I wish," said Prime Minister Melbourne, "that I was as sure of any one thing as—Tom Macaulay is sure of everything"!

To an anecdote. We remember when a boy meeting Tom Hill when Macaulay was in the first flush of his reputation. Tom Hill was the Hull of Theodore Hook—the Paul Pry of Mr. Poole. Tom knew a good deal. "My young friend," said Tommy, "I happen to know this, that John Murray would give the copyright of 'Childe Harold' to Macaulay of Trinity, old Zachary's son, to quit the Edinburgh Review and write for the Quarterly." Macaulay, however, was true to his first friend, Lord Lansdowne, and to his first love, Jeffrey and his Review.

On Monday next, at one, all that is mortal of Macaulay will be laid in Westminster Abbey. There will be a large attendance and a large manly sentiment of regret in all who will be present. Nor will this regret be confined within the time-honoured walls of Westminster. No nave, or transept, or choir—no cathedral, no public cemetery—could hold the persons who will regret that Macaulay is no more.

The seven committee-men of the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester are to receive this week seven silver testimonial candlesticks or centre-pieces—we forget which—in recognition of their services in carrying out the well-conceived design of the Exhibition. On the same occasion, so wags assert, Mr. J. C. Deane, the founder and father of the Exhibition, is to receive a splendidly-gilt frame, with Manchester plate-glass, displaying, for preservation and posterity, Mr. Deane's bill of costs in recovering at law from the committee the money adjudged due to him under contract, for his many and all-important services in conceiving the Exhibition and carrying it to a successful issue.

There is a pretty controversy waging in print touching the merits of a large fresco just completed by Mr. Watts for Lincoln's Inn Hall. A contemporary thought to know something about art has condemned it with unsparing severity; another contemporary has scourged the critic with the rod; and now Mr. Layard has rushed into print to do what he considers full justice to Mr. Watts. Cannot personal dislikes and likings be traced on both sides? What Mr. Watts has done is no whit better than what Barry did at the Adelphi some eighty years ago.

Tennyson to the rescue for a third time! The Poet Laureate of Cambridge was called on some six months since to catch threepenny pieces for Once a Week. This month the same great poet has been engaged to draw as many shillings as he can for Macmillan's Magazine. And now—i.e. next month—he is engaged at a guinea a line to bring shillings to the golden granary of the Cornhill Magazine. Who is to have him next?

And Ned Wright is dead—Ned of the Adelphi—a genuine actor—one that, had he lived in days when acting was more thought of and more studied, would have been still more consummate than he was. His age was said to have been forty-six, but he was at least forty-eight. We were at school with him, and with another accomplished actor, happily still alive, Leigh Murray. What was Wright's age, Mr. Murray? Ned was a fine fellow.

What is an hospital? The late Lord Henry Seymour left the residue of his large fortune "aux hospices de Paris et de Londres." Can Christ's Hospital share the residue with Guy's Hospital? Poor Lord Henry Seymour! What an hospital means under your will is to be decided by Chancery. Alas for the residue?

Albert Smith, the public will learn with pleasure, has so completely recovered from his apoplectic attack that he is to reappear on Tuesday next, in his old winning and money-making business of a caterer to the demands of the town. Of the town only?—no; of all who are willing to be pleased, and know when they are pleased.

A man to whom England is under many obligations makes his reappearance this first week of the New Year as an author, and his first appearance also as an editor. Rush to Routledge's for Mr. Russell's "Diary in India," and give your orders at once for the first number of the Army and Navy Gazette, published this day, and edited by Printing-house-square William Howard Russell. Riflemen, read Russell if you will not buy Billy Russell of European and Asiatic fame.

It is now considered certain that none of the passengers and crew of the Blervie Castle were saved. A collision is deemed the probable cause of the disaster.

Purple and Mauve Colours.—It may be useful to know how to distinguish whether those colours, now so much in vogue, are fixed or not. This is ascertained, says a correspondent, simply by putting on the ribbon or other fabric a drop of vinegar, or, still better, of lemon juice, which will change the fast purple or mauve to a crimson, whilst it will destroy the fugitive one.

MUSIC.

Mr. Willert Beale has commenced an extensive tour in the provinces, with a party of vocal and instrumental performers, including Mdlle. Corbari, Madame Fiorentini, Herr Reichardt, Signor Tagliafico, Signor Sivori, Signor Bottesini, Mr. Brinley Richards, and other artists of distinction. Mr. Balfe and his daughter were announced as being of the party, but it appears that this is not the case. A concert was given at St. James's Hall on Monday last in connection with this enterprise, and at which all the performers engaged for it were to assist. But Mr. and Miss Victoire Balfe did not appear; and Mr. Beale accounted for their absence by publishing a correspondence tending to show that Mr. Balfe, after entering into a formal engagement with Mr. Beale so long ago as August last, had gone with his daughter to St. Petersburg, whence they had failed to return, so as to fulfil their engagement. Mr. Balfe must feel himself called upon to explain this transaction, and justify himself from a charge of deliberate breach of faith. Mr. Beale is certainly much aggrieved by the unexpected absence of Miss Balfe, who was engaged as the principal attraction of his vocal party during the tour. At the concert of Monday evening the appearance of Signor Sivori and Signor Bottesini, after an absence of several years from England, made a great sensation. They both played more wonderfully than ever, and were received with the utmost enthusiasm. Mdlle. Corbari, who, it will be remembered, stood high in public favour, both at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, was exceedingly well received. Herr Reichardt, too, was warmly applauded for his performance of his own beautiful song, "Thou art so near!" and Mr. Brinley Richards played two solos on the pianoforte with his usual brilliancy and success.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union are giving daily performances at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, in pursuance of an engagement with Mr. Mitchell, of Bond-street. We have so often described the admirable singing of these accomplished vocalists, and the interesting "literary illustrations" by Mr. Thomas Oliphant, that it is sufficient to say that these performances are more successful than ever, filling the Dudley Gallery every day with crowded and fashionable audiences.

The committee for the next Festival of the Three Choirs appear to be "taking time by the forelock." The arrangements for the meeting at Worcester this year are already announced in the local journal. The festival is to commence on Tuesday, the 11th of September, Mr. Done being, as usual, the conductor; and there will be the ordinary number of sacred performances in the Cathedral, and secular evening concerts at the College Hall. The names of the stewards are published; they are thirty-four in number, consisting of the most distinguished noblemen and gentlemen of the district, with the Earl of Shrewsbury at their head.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul reappeared at the St. James's Hall on Monday in their popular illustrations. Several new songs and characters were introduced, and the entertainment passed off with great spirit. The photograph of Mr. Sims Reeves still remains an important feature.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The next examination of candidates for direct commissions in the Army will be held on Wednesday, the 1st of February next, and following days.

The magnificent three-decker the Howe, pierced for 121 guns, now in course of construction at Pembroke Dockyard, will be ready by March next, and will be launched in the early part of the spring.

The total force at present in the Aldershott division, including men on furlough, amounts to 16,000 of all arms, of which number about 13,000 are actually in camp, divided into three brigades of infantry and one of cavalry.

The Globe, in announcing that the reorganisation of the militia is under consideration, talks about the probability of its being placed on the "old constitutional footing," and maintains that it must be increased, even should the compulsory ballot be requisite.

The inquest on King, who was shot in the recent military affray at Aldershott, terminated yesterday week. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that the deceased was "feloniously killed" by some person unknown, and added their belief that no shots were fired by the Tower Hamlets Militia.

Admiral Bowles has tendered his resignation as Commander at Portsmouth, in consequence, we infer, of being called to task by the authorities for the recent publication of his correspondence with the Admiralty on the subject of the Princess Royal mutiny. The resignation has been accepted.

Major Riversdale Glyn, of the Rifle Brigade, died on his way home from India. All through Oude, up to the Terai, through the summer and winter campaigns, through the subsequent marches, he went on foot with his men till the dispersion of the rebels brought to him and his brigade a short rest, which only developed the seeds of the disease planted by exposure.

The Naval Reserve scheme came into operation with the new year; the business connected with it is to be managed by the Board of Trade. Circulars have been sent to the leading navigation companies, and cordial replies received. The Peninsular and Oriental Company have invited their seamen to enrol, pointing out that they could attend the twenty-eight days' drill while their ships are staying in port, and thus secure £8 or £9 a year addition to their wages, with the prospect of the pension of £12 a year after a certain time of enrolment.

The Lords of the Admiralty have directed a number of pieces of timber belonging to the old frigate Shannon, lately broken up at Chatham Dockyard, to be forwarded to Somerset House, to be preserved in the Model-room of the Admiralty, where they will be converted into blocks and stands for the various models, in order to be kept as relics of that famous old frigate. A considerable quantity of the timber has been sent to Portsmouth to be used at that dockyard, most of the timbers being as sound as they were when the frigate was built.

The ceremony of installing the new Lord Mayor of Dublin (Alderman Carroll) took place on Monday with the customary formalities.

The Cork Examiner reports the arrival at Queenstown of a remarkable cargo from America, en route for Italy, being no less than 23,000 muskets, contributed to Garibaldi by a few sympathisers in the United States. The story goes that the ship sailed before the news of the guerilla chief's resignation of his command had reached the States, and that the ship is now waiting at Queenstown for further orders.

The Emperor of Austria has issued regulations which considerably relax the restrictions imposed on traders and artizans by the guild and corporation laws and customs. He has likewise instituted a commission for the management of the national debt and the sinking fund; and the directions framed for the commissioners' guidance are said to have given satisfaction in Vienna, though the state of the Austrian finances seems to render utterly superfluous all regulations for a sinking fund.

Recovery of the "Euphemia."—This vessel, which was sunk last month in Gravesend Reach from having come in collision with the Lady Eglinton screw-steamer, was recovered on Wednesday by means of a patent derrick. The recovered vessel was brought through Gravesend Reach firmly held in the grip of the powerful little derrick, and placed on shore facing the Clifton Baths for examination by Lloyd's surveyors as to the injuries sustained through the collision.

A letter received from her Majesty's ship Lynx, dated at Zanzibar, October 23, says:—"On our arrival here we found a war going on between the Sultan and his brother, the latter having possession of the town. The Assaye steam-frigate lying here landed one hundred men, and we landed fifty, with a gun and rockets, under Lieutenant Barclay, the whole forming a field detachment. The rebels were driven out of the town and the Sultan's brother taken prisoner. He has been conveyed in the Assaye to Muscat."

Havelock's Grave.—Sir Henry Havelock writes to the Times about his father's grave, absolving Major Crommelin from all blame in reference to the delay which has occurred in putting up a monument. "The responsiblity," he says, "of all the delay rests on me, and me solely; and permit me to add (in approaching this subject for the first and last time in public) is shared by no other member of my father's family. The causes of it are of an entirely private nature; I will not, therefore, intrude them on you, content as I am to await with confidence the imperial verdict of England, till time and a better knowledge of the attendant circumstances shall have removed the implied stigma which this avowal may cast on me. I should not now have troubled you on this subject, had I not felt myself bound, in justice to Major Crommelin, to remove, by every means in my power, an erroneous impression to the prejudice of an officer, than whom there is not a more hardworking or scrupulously exact man in our army."

Seven very richly-ornamental pieces of plate, of the same design—the manufacture of Hunt and Roskell—have just been presented to the seven gentlemen who presided over the various committees of the Manchester Exhibition of Art-Treasures in 1855.

The remains of Dr. Beddome, who was much respected at Romsey, and who was six times Mayor of the borough, were conveyed on Thursday week to their last resting-place. The shops of the town were closed, and a large number of persons followed the mournful procession. Lord Palmerston was among the chief mourners.

A Cheap Election.—The election accounts for the borough of Liskeard for Mr. Bernal Osborne's election have just been published. The total amount of expenses published is £66 13s. 10d. Those include returning officer's charge, £10 2s. 8d.; printing and stationery, £14 12s. 6d.; advertising, £3 14s. 3d.; posting addresses, £3 16s.; election auditor, £12 19s. 6d.; sundry other items make up the total.

Kington, the Coventry murderer, was hanged at Warwick yesterday week. The hour of execution was kept secret, and there were not more than 500 persons present. The wretched man had the nerve to commence an address to the crowd, observing, "I hope, my friends, this will be a warning to you;" but the mob were so noisy that he gave up the effort.

A meeting of the Lord Provost's committee was held yesterday week at Edinburgh, with the committees appointed by the Chamber of Commerce and Merchant Company, for the purpose of considering the proposed Amalgamation Bill of the Caledonian, Edinburgh and Glasgow, and Scottish Central Railways. After duly considering the terms of the bill the meeting came to the unanimous resolution that it should be opposed.

The Rev. R. N. Law, treasurer of the Wells Cathedral, has recently addressed an admirable pamphlet on the subject of statute fairs to the Right Hon. T. H. Sotheron Estcourt, M.P. The rev. gentleman contends, in powerful language, for the abolition of a system which cannot be too severely condemned, and which is fraught with social evils of a very serious character.

At the Birmingham Public Office, yesterday week, Mr. James Tonge, accountant, was brought up on a remanded charge of forging the name of Mr. Joseph Whiles, treasurer to a money society, of which the prisoner was secretary, to a promissory note for £50, and embezzling a portion of the money for the same. The prisoner was committed for trial on the charge of embezzlement.

On Monday, the 26th ultimo, says the Exeter Gazette, Mr. William Palk, who has for some time evinced a kind and very great interest in behalf of the "navvies," gave a supper to more than a hundred of them. Through the liberality of Lady Rolle, the men were supplied with some delicious venison pasties. After supper the navvies presented their friend, Mr. Palk, with a silver goblet, subscribed for by men working in all parts of England.

A deplorable accident occurred on the Mersey yesterday week, by which twenty-two persons lost their lives. A party of twenty-eight men, who had been working on board an emigrant-ship in the river, were being put ashore in a sailing-boat, a brisk wind blowing at the time; and they had got near the Brunswick Pier when the boat began to ship water, and, a heavy sea striking her, she suddenly went down. Assistance was promptly rendered, but only six were picked up and saved.

The third annual concert lately established at the village of Adare, Limerick, came off with considerable éclat on the 30th of December. These concerts have been designed and established by the Countess of Dunraven with a view to the mental improvement and cultivation of the lower classes, including large numbers of children attending the various schools in that neighbourhood. This design, so novel in Ireland, has met, we are happy to say, with the greatest success; and on this occasion upwards of five hundred of the surrounding gentry and others testified throughout their warmest admiration and delight at the gratification afforded them.

Hounslow Private Theatricals.—On Wednesday and Thursday, last week, two amateur performances took place at Hounslow, at an elegantly-constructed theatre, erected under the direction of Lord William Lennox, who lent his aid in getting up the entertainments. The comedy of "The Honeymoon," and the farce of "High Life Below Stairs," were acted on the first, and "The Ladies' Battle" and "Little Toddlekins" on the second. All the characters were well sustained, as was fully proved by the plaudits that attended the exertions of the company. A humorous prologue, written for the occasion by Lord W. Lennox, was spoken with much point by J. Mitchell, Esq., and Mrs. John Gaunt Lye.

Mr. Cardwell at Oxford.—On Monday night Mr. Cardwell attended, as usual, the annual New-Year's feast of the Druids at Oxford, having posted from Dublin for the purpose. He spoke generally of liberty for Central Italy, urged a complete system of defence as the best surety against war, but anticipated that the expenses incident thereto would necessitate a continuation of the income tax. Speaking of his post as Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Cardwell bore testimony to the rapid advance of the country, acknowledging, however, that he found great difficulties incident to its government. A Reform Bill had been promised and would be prepared, avoiding the shoals on which the predecessors of the Government had split; and, with other advantages in its favour, he hoped that the present Government would be enabled to perfect a prudent and satisfactory measure.

The Duke of Sutherland gave a ball on Thursday se'nnight at his seat at Trentham to upwards of 100 of his domestics and persons employed in various capacities on the Trentham estate. The ball was opened by her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland and the Earl of Carlisle, and the following nobility and gentry also took part in the pleasures of the evening, and to their utmost endeavoured to promote the enjoyment of all who were present:—The Duke and Duchess of Argyll and family, the Marquis and Marchioness of Stafford and family, the Earl and Lady Constance Grosvenor, Viscount Clifden, Lady Caroline Lascelles and the Misses Lascelles (three), Mr. Sneyd, Captain Bulwer, Captain Egerton, and Captain Lane. The Duke of Sutherland spent some time in the ballroom. At twelve o'clock supper was served, and subsequently dancing was resumed, and was kept up till four o'clock in the morning. In the course of the evening Mr. Scott, the Duke's piper, and Mr. M'Alister, piper to the Marquis of Stafford, played several national airs, and Mr. Scott performed a sword dance with astonishing dexterity.

A Romance of Real Life is thus told in one of the morning papers:—Some days ago a Mr. Wyatt, of Reigate, was summoned to the Bromley Petty Sessions to show cause why he refused to maintain his wife, Amy Wyatt, then a pauper lunatic at Barming Asylum. His reasons for refusing to maintain her will appear in the following narrative:—About eight years ago he was living with his wife at Reigate, where they kept a little general shop, he being occasionally employed as a labourer. The husband went out one morning, the wife telling him not to hurry home, as she would keep his dinner hot. On his return he found she had gone, leaving her only child, a little boy, behind. Inquiries were made, but nothing was heard of her. The brewer who supplied them with table-beer for sale told the husband that he had seen her at home during the day when he called. Months passed on, and no tidings whatever were heard, when a letter was received from his wife giving as a reason why she had left her home that she could not live any longer in such a smoky house. Her whereabouts, however, was not even then discovered. The brewer's wife died in the meantime from distress through her husband's effects being sold for debt. Mrs. Wyatt's sister and sister's husband, who, it has since appeared, had some hand in decoying her from home, also died under very distressing circumstances. The brewer was lost sight of, and the husband had given up all thoughts of again seeing his wife. Being over at Bromley one day on business at Farwig, he saw on the sign of the Royal Oak a familiar name. Curiosity induced him to enter, when he beheld his old friend the brewer of Reigate. Their mutual salutations induced a female to come out of the bar, in whom the visitor discovered no other than his long-lost spouse. Leaving our readers to conjecture the scene that ensued, we may add that Wyatt industriously circulated the tale of his wrongs, the business fell off, and the concern was sold. She who had deserted her partner was in turn deserted herself, and in consequence became a lunatic and a pauper.

FINE ARTS.

SUFFOLK-STREET GALLERY.

Mr. Wallis has removed his fine collection of modern pictures from the Old Water-colour Society's Gallery to the more spacious premises of the Society of British Artists, in Suffolk-street, where they were opened to public view on Monday. The extended area thus afforded is particularly favourable to the proper viewing of some of the more important pictures of the larger class, as Maclise's grand dramatic picture of "The Bohemians—a Gipsy Festival;" Poole's two of "Solomon Eagle Preaching during the Plague of London," and "Messengers announcing to Job the Loss of his Cattle," &c.; and Callcott's fine classical landscape. About a hundred pictures have been added to the collection, which now comprises upwards of three hundred. Amongst the recent additions we notice particularly Dobson's "Almsdeeds of Dorcas," the engraved picture; Frith's capital cabinet pictures, "Sancho before the Duchess," and a "Scene from Goldsmith's 'Goodnatured Man;" T. Roberts "In Memoriam" picture, "The Opinions of the Press," and others, which have been familiarised to us at the exhibitions of the last season.

MEMOIRS OF EARLY ITALIAN PAINTERS, AND OF THE PROGRESS OF PAINTING IN ITALY, FROM CIMABUE TO BASSANO. By MRS. JAMESON. A New Edition. Murray.

The history of this little volume is in itself a signal evidence of the rapid advance which has been by the arts of design in the esteem and appreciation of the public within the last few years, and which is still in progress. Fourteen years ago the materials of this work were published in a series of pocket brochures, entitled "Knight's Shilling Volumes," of which they formed two; but their sale, we apprehend, was not very rapid, as a large remainder stock afterwards made its appearance at a reduced price, distributed amongst the secondhand book-stalls. Since then the work has appeared in a single volume, printed upon better paper, and with additional illustrations, at a price three times that originally charged, and commands a ready market. To the first reprint by Mr. Murray it was objected that it was not a new edition, in the proper sense of the word, being entirely worked from the original stereotype plates, without revision by the author or correction of any kind, and the consequence was an imperfect and unsatisfactory book, with many incongruities of date in reference to that on the titlepage. This complaint has been completely obviated in the elegant edition now before us, which has been "revised throughout by the author, and with much additional matter."

We hail the appearance of this volume in its improved form with pleasure, as a valuable and agreeable aid to that art-culture of which we have spoken as making such progress amongst us, and as tending to give it an ennobling and improving purpose. We know of no one who writes so attractively yet so seriously on art as Mrs. Jameson. With her a picture is something more than a painting to please the eye, or even to fascinate the fancy—it is a means to an end, that end being to elevate the mind above the every-day themes and objects of life, and to bring it into relation with other minds more gifted, more informed than itself. In this view, looking not merely at the picture itself, but through the picture into the genius and thought of him who painted it, she establishes a spiritual relationship with creative minds of all shapes and shades, of various periods, which have found opportunity for utterance from time to time, through the medium of scriptural revelation, theological and profane history, poetical fable, domestic incident, individual realisation (in portraiture), and, finally, in every object in creation—animal, vegetable—the earth, the sky, the mighty ocean, the devious stream—all under different conditions, in never-ending variety, according to the fancy and will of the painter.

As further conducive to this great and never-failing pursuit of studying the painter through his works, Mrs. Jameson has with charming taste and discrimination blended biography with art-description and criticism; so that those who take up this volume to satisfy a superficial curiosity as to names and dates cannot fail to lay it down imbued with something of a feeling for art and a desire for further acquaintance with its mysteries. In her references to the chefs-d'œuvres of the different painters she very judiciously bears particularly in view the treasures in our National Gallery, and other important collections. An intelligible value and purport is thus given to the walls of the picture gallery which it could not command without such assistance.

Whilst, however, bearing testimony to the merit of this performance as far as it goes, we must add that it goes but a short way towards giving a complete and appreciable notion of the progress of art, upward and downward, since the Revival in the fifteenth century. We have here only the rise of art from its first commencement, about, or a little previous to, the time of Cimabue, at the close of the thirteenth century, down to the culmination of its grandeur and effulgence under Da Vinci, Michael Angelo, Raphael, Correggio, and Titian, during the closing years of the fifteenth and commencement of the sixteenth centuries. The decadence under their numerous followers, who degenerated into "mannerists," and the brief but brilliant reaction under the "schools"—particularly that of the Carracci; and, finally, the struggle between the naturalists and the idealists which led to the development of so much genius of a new order, and in a new direction, not only in Italy, but in other parts of Europe—none of these are touched upon; and, unfortunately, it is precisely of works of this struggling and chequered period that the major part of the contents of the galleries, not only in England but throughout Europe, consist. The incompleteness of the work in this respect is rendered the more apparent from a perusal of the "introduction," now first added to it, wherein we find mention of Annibal Carracci, Rubens, Rembrandt, Cuyp, Holbein, &c., not one of whom is treated of in the text. Perhaps Mrs. Jameson may one day be induced to publish a second volume, not restricted to Italian art, which will supply this want, and if she does so she will confer a boon upon all students and lovers of art.

A word in conclusion about the illustrations to the volume. They are numerous and well executed, but we have seen many of them in other works published by Mr. Murray, and which we already possessed; whilst, at the same time, there were abundant opportunities supplied by the text for the production of examples strictly appropriate to the purpose of the work (early Italian art) which are as yet but little known. We hope this may be remedied in future.

THE ELEMENTS OF PERSPECTIVE. By JOHN RUSKIN. Smith, Elder, and Co.

Any attempt to reduce the mysteries of perspective to common-sense principles, appreciable by common observation, must be a boon to art-students who do not wish to be bewildered with the abstruse theories of optics in determining points which are capable of establishment by any one of ordinary capacity by merely looking through a pane of glass in a window. Mr. Ruskin has attempted such a task in the small volume before us, which, as far as previous mathematical acquirement is concerned, only refers to the first three books of Euclid. In starts upon the principle that every pane of glass in a window, or rather what you see through it, may be considered a picture, the lines of which are capable of being traced upon the glass itself, and he then shows how by greater or less distance of the eye from the pane the picture is diminished or increased in extent, so as to take in less or more of the external objects; and, then, how by fixing the eye at any given point, called the "sight-point," all the rest of the lines in the picture may be determined. The book is abundantly illustrated with diagrams, and we cordially recommend it to all beginners in drawing.

STEREOSCOPES.—A very important improvement has just been made in the manufacture of stereoscopes by Messrs. Smith, Beck, and Beck, of Coleman-street, under the name of the achromatic stereoscope. This instrument was contrived expressly for the exhibition of paper stereoscopes, either as mounted in the ordinary way or as illustrations in books. The principal feature of this stereoscope is the application of a mirror in such a position as that when the instrument is held facing the light the picture receives reflected rays in addition to the direct ones. This double illumination not only imparts a proportionate brilliancy to the photographs, but, from the circumstance of the light falling in opposite directions, there are no shadows produced by the irregularities upon the surface of the paper, and thus many of those glaring imperfections are rendered invisible. Messrs Smith, Beck, and Beck have also combined with this arrangement the same achromatic lenses as in their other stereoscopes, so as to afford the best definition, and to correct the colour produced on the margins of objects by single lenses. Besides the improved and fuller view of the stereoscope obtained by means of the increased volume of light, these stereoscopes present a great advantage when used in society, being no longer "fixtures," as we may term them, in a particular spot and light, as old stereoscopes necessarily are, but capable of being passed about from hand to hand, and of commanding a supply of light in almost any position relative to the source of illumination.

THE FARM.

MR. STRAFFORD opens his campaign on the 1st of March with the sale of Mr. Crawley's shorthorn herd, at Stockwood Park, near Luton, in Bedfordshire. It includes upwards of fifty lots, of which forty-five are cows and heifers. Mr. Crawley was a spirited purchaser at the sales of Messrs. Grundy, Ackroyd, Tanqueray, and Harvey Combe, &c., and has spared no expense in hiring crack bulls. First Fruits, by Sir Samuel, from Sister to Windsor, is his Warlaby proxy at present; but British Prince, Highthorn, War Eagle, Welcome Guest, and Prince Oscar are all represented among the females, the first three more especially. Colonel Towneley's Jasper has also been a sojourner in the Stockwood pastures; and the Bates blood has been handed down by Kirklevington, a son of First Grand Duke, from a Wild Eyes.

Mr. Duckham, the author of "The Hereford Herdbook," has written a very interesting letter to confute the opinion that Mr. Naylor's cow Variety, who won the head prize in her class, was or is (fat cows have such remarkable reprieves now that we know not whether to use the present or past tense) quite pure-bred. Her colour had been the point which fostered scepticism. Mr. Duckham, however, divides this celebrated breed into four classes—the dark grey, the mottle-faced, the red with white, and the light grey or white; and it seems that, true to her name, she claims kindred for five generations back with all the four, and particularly with the white and dark grey. The latter of these two have a white or spotted back, and a body of rather darker red than the general colour of the red with white-faced Herefords. The same gentleman also adduces as a proof of the increased interest taken in these cattle, in their own county, that at the Hereford Show, in 1853, only forty-five were entered in the classes, whereas in 1859 this number was swelled to 111. We need hardly add at the beginning of a new year how acceptable any information as to flocks, herds, and agriculture generally will be to us.

The examination at the Cirencester Agricultural College (whose academic eye and skill in breeding shorthorns we could not compliment at the Warwick Royal) has ended very satisfactorily, and three diplomas have been granted—viz., to J. Appleby, from Hants; J. Hull, from Lancashire; and C. S. Bigge, from Northumberland. Only sixteen students leave this term; and the college seems to be in a healthy, thriving state at last, after those few ups and downs which all new projects must naturally undergo before they settle down into national institutions. Alderman Mechi's proposed fund for decayed farmers goes steadily on, but we believe that it has been slightly retarded by a misconception as to the management of the Richmond Fund. It will perhaps be remembered that some money, amounting it appears to about £2000, was subscribed a few years ago as a testimonial to his Grace, who generously requested that it might be so invested as to form an annuity fund for three farmers' widows, two of whom he was to nominate. Accordingly, the Dukes of Cleveland and Richmond, the Earl of Chichester, and Sir John Lubbock became the trustees, and three annuitants are at present receiving £15 a year each. The annual meetings had been so small that the press had naturally omitted to notice them.

The Farmers' Magazine opens the year well with a portrait of Mr. James Howard, of the Britannia Works, Bedford, one of the makers of that firm's general purpose "Champion Plough" (as the late Mr. Pusey christened it), which has won no less than fourteen first prizes at the Royal Agricultural Society's meetings. So delighted were the good people of Bedford when the news came down that their Tubal Cains had been successful with it in three classes at the Chelmsford Show in 1856 that the church bells were set ringing, a pleasant tribute to the vast temple of industrious peace which had gradually arisen under their shadow on the banks of the Ouse. It is stated that a plough is now made at these works at the rate of one every ten minutes, and that more than 50,000 have been turned out from it since the Exhibition of '51. It is curious to turn from this account to the black-letter learning of Mr. Cuthbert Johnson in the next paper, on "Early English Agricultural Authors." Quoting from "The Boke of Husbandry," published in 1534, he says:—"In Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, and Gloucestershire, the share-team, that in many places is called the plow-head, is four or fyve feet longe, made very broad and thynne; and that is because the lande is very toughe, and would sucke the plowe into the earth, if the share teams were not very longe, broade, and thinne. In Kent they alter muche in fashion, for there theye goe upon wheeles, as they do in some parts of Hartfordshire, Sussexe, and Cornewalle." "The Herds of Great Britain" also reach their thirteenth chapter in this number, with Mr. Samuel Wiley's, who, as a sheep, pig, shorthorn breeder, and farmer combined, has had no superior in England, and is still competing as vigorously as ever at eighty-four. Half a century ago he was a constant attendant at the Barmpton tup-lettings, and often journeyed on horseback, in after summers, with Sir Tatton Sykes and his huntsman, Tom Carter, to Burgess's of Holme Pierrepoint, Stone's of Quorndon, and Buckley's of Normanton, in pursuit of pure Leicesters. Carcase, who beat the far-famed Duke of Northumberland at York, and Van Dunck, were his most famous prize bulls; and Victoria and Lady Chandos, by Buckingham (who won the gold medal in her class at Smithfield in 1849), his most celebrated cows. Four of his "small Yorkshire" prize pigs in 1858 realised fifty guineas, and there are, in fact, few great pig-breeders, from Prince Albert downwards, who have not a "Wiley" feeding out of a "Torr's patent trough."

THE "GREAT EASTERN."—Mr. Campbell, the chairman of the Great Ship Company, has issued a circular to the shareholders against certain misrepresentations and misconceptions with regard to the history of the Great Eastern. Its general purport is to the effect that every inquiry will be courted at the meeting on the 11th of January; that much of the present trouble in connection with the undertaking arises from dissensions at the board, fomented by persons who are seeking "their own personal aggrandisement even at the risk of ruining the enterprise;" and that the work requisite to fit the vessel for a long voyage cannot involve any heavy amount. The letter is accompanied by a printed correspondence with the Government, in which the same aid was demanded for the Great Eastern as is accorded to other vessels under the subsidy system—a request replied to by Mr. Gladstone on the 5th ult. by an intimation that nothing can be done until the committee of contracts, which is about to be renewed, shall have made their report.

BURKE'S "PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE."—The edition of this work for 1860, by Sir Bernard Burke, has just appeared, and, in its scarlet cover and gilded regal ornament on front, is one of the most showy books of the season. The revision and extension it has undergone render its size still more portly, and give full right to its claim of being the only complete Peerage and Baronetage published. In this edition more minute details are, for the first time in any work of the kind, given of the Bishops and their families; and, in allusion to this, and to his entering more fully into the lineage and history of the naval and military peers, Sir Bernard, in his prefatory notice, writes gracefully as follows:—"I have long felt it absolutely necessary that fuller particulars should be given, as they are in this volume, of the Bishops, who form one of the very highest and most important classes of the State. The other extension is no less requisite. The deeds and the lineage of our distinguished naval and military officers merit the amplest details, for certain it is that, in all the annals of war, there have appeared at no time men of daring more heroic and effective, of devotion more patriotic, or of souls more generous and noble, than those seamen and soldiers who have founded, sustained, and consolidated, the martial glory and greatness of the British Empire. Their history in all its bearings cannot be too constantly brought before their countrymen, as a bright and gratifying recollection of the past and an inspiring theme for the future." Burke's Peerage and Baronetage is now quite a national annual.

OUT-DOOR AMUSEMENTS.

JANUARY.

ACCORDING to Pennant we find twenty genera of animals, from the horse down to the seal and bat, forty-eight of birds, four of reptiles, forty of fish, in addition to crustaceous and shell fish. The horse is found of many mingled breeds, the racehorses descend from Arabian sires, and the genealogy extends to hunters. The immense size of the English draughthorses is derived from those of Germany, Flanders, and Holstein, which have been mixed with other breeds; the result has been the most splendid animals adapted for state, pleasure, or utility. Who that looks upon a Newmarket "two-year-old," a Leicestershire hunter, a lady's thoroughbred palfrey, a clever park hack, a pair of high-stepping carriage horses, a "team" of roadsters, a Suffolk punch, a strong cob, a Shetland pony, an Irish steeplechaser, or a Brobdignag-looking drayhorse, would believe them to be the produce of one small island? For sport, the fox (the only wild animal that is to be found in England), the stag, and the hare, yield an abundance of amusement to the disciple of Nimrod; the pheasant from Colchis, the partridge, woodcock, snipe, wild duck, and geese furnish recreation to the gunner, while the salmon, the trout, and myriads of small fry delight the follower of old Isaak Walton, as the dorée, sole, cod, turbot, plaice, smelt, mullet, eel, lamprey, and lampern do the epicure. Nor must we forget our indigenous lobsters, crabs, and the Colchester and Milton oysters, which quite retain their Roman reputation.

In France the horses do not appear to have been celebrated at any period; and it is an historical fact that the ancient Monarchs were drawn to the national assemblies by oxen. Within the last thirty years, however, many English horses have been imported into that country; hence the wonderful advancement in their cavalry, riding, and driving horses. The best native horses for draught are those of Normandy; for the saddle, those of the Limoçin, which have latterly been greatly improved by crossing the breed with the English, Arabian, and Turkish. The wild boar, wolf, ibex, and chamois, which are found on the Pyrenees and the Alps, the deer, the red-legged partridge, hare, and snipe, add much to the gratification of the chasseur, as every species of sportsman is called in France, from the wild-boar hunter down to the Parisian petit maître who indulges in a day after les rouges gorges. As a nation our Continental neighbours are not piscatorial, and know as little of throwing a fly as an inhabitant of the South Sea Islands does of the polka.

In Holland and Belgium the zoology affords nothing worthy of remark. The Flanders mares are esteemed for their size; and the shores, rivers, and canals abound with edible fish, a great quantity of which is sent over to our country.

In the Austrian and Prussian dominions the breed of horses requires no comment; they are tolerably well suited to the purposes required of them. Many of the Austrian horses run wild, and are sold in great numbers at the fairs before they have been subject to any training. The bison is said to be found in the Carpathian forests. Among the wild animals may also be named the bear, the boar, the wolf, the chamois, and the beaver. In the German States the horses are generally more remarkable for weight than spirit. The wild boar is of a superior size, and those of Westphalia are held in particular estimation. At Vienna the higher classes are extremely devoted to the battue, and an Imperial shooting party often takes place. The system seems to have been one adopted by the ancient Egyptians, for, according to Wilkinson's most interesting work upon their manners and customs, we find that persons were employed to form a large circle in which all sorts of game were driven; the circuit was then gradually decreased, and the sportsmen, being placed in the centre, had all driven up to them, when an indiscriminate slaughter took place, something very much after the fashion of an eagle in a dovecot.

In Switzerland the horses are esteemed for vigour and spirit. Among the animals peculiar to the Alps may be first named the ibex, or rock goat. Another singular animal is the chamois, which is commonly seen in herds of twenty and thirty, with a vidette, who alarms them by a shrill cry.

The glory of the Spanish zoology is the horse, which has been famous in all ages, probably originating from the barb, or beautiful and spirited steed from the north of Africa, the immediate offspring of the Arabian. The mules, too, are also excellent; and the ass is no ignoble animal, though not equal to that of Arabia. The Portuguese horses are inferior to those of Spain. The bull-fights have justly been regarded as the most striking feature of Spanish manners. We look upon such spectacles as brutal and demoralising, tending to lower the character of the nation.

The Danish dominions, Norway and Sweden, being of such great extent and variety of climate, there is a great diversity in their animals. The horses of Norway and Iceland are as remarkable for diminutive size as those of Holstein are for the contrary quality. Among the more peculiar animals may be first named the reindeer, common in Finland and throughout Lapland. The elk is a more southern animal, and sometimes appears in Norway, which is infested by the wolf, the bear, and the lynx. The salmon supplies a considerable part of the Laplanders' food, and vast numbers are transported, on reindeers, from the shores of the Tana.

The Italian horses offer a very poor specimen of the equine race. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants of many of the States are fond of sport, as may be gleaned from the fact that English racing and English hunting have both been patronised in this land of song.

Horse-racing forms one of the principal amusements of the Carnival at Rome. A Roman horse-race is, however, a very different thing from an English one. Instead of a contest in which the skill and boldness of man are as much to be admired as the speed and vigour of the animal he rides, the Roman course presents nothing but the horse, which runs without any rider. It is not, however, left entirely to its own spirit and emulation; if it were, the sight would be more interesting, as showing the natural character of the animal; but it is started by noise and goaded on by contrivances quite as artificial as the whip and spur of our jockeys.

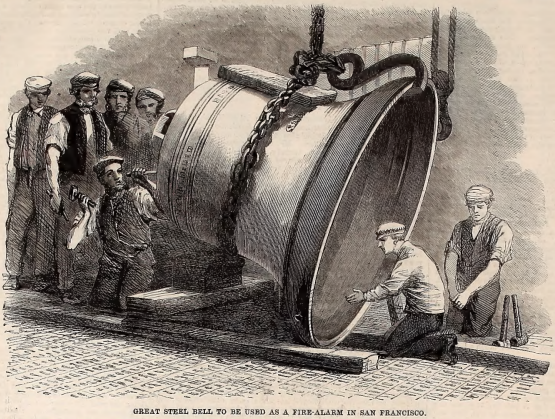
The Maltese have a curious method of horse-racing, which is thus described by Macfarlane:—

"The horses are, indeed, mounted, but they are not furnished with saddle, bridle, or anything of the sort; the riders sit on the bare back and have no reins or anything else in their hands except a small, pointed instrument, not unlike a cobbler's awl, with which they prick their steeds. These races are held in the month of June near Civita Vecchia, in the interior of the island. The horses are generally barbs, imported from the neighbouring coast of Africa—small, good tempered, and certainly not swift. To these characteristics of the animals, which facilitate such a mode of equitation, we must add the important circumstance that where the run or the great effort is made they go up hill. With an animal of anything like the velocity and springy action of the English racehorse it would be impossible to do without what the author of an excellent article on the turf in the Quarterly Review, calls 'the fulcrum of the stirrups,' and it would only be a little less impossible to stop him without bit or bridle. Indeed, even with such steeds as some of them have, we fancy, if the Maltese would reverse the case, and make the ground run down hill instead of up, that not many of them would keep their seats. It would excite the derision of the Buckles and the Chifneys, and other heroes of our turf, to see a naked-legged, naked-armed, red-sashed, slovenly set of fellows rolling about on their ponies like so many Bacchuses on wine-barrels, flourishing their awls, and bawling out in the most indecorous manner. But, notwithstanding this, the Maltese races certainly offer a novel and amusing scene to the stranger."

The zoology of Prussia seems to contain no important feature. The breed of horses have not impressed travellers with any great opinion of them.

In the territory of the Czar we find an excellent breed of horses, and nothing can exceed the enduring qualities of those of the Cossacks of the Don. The more peculiar animals are the white bear of Nova Zembla, and the souslik of the south. In the more northern parts are found the wolf, the elk, and the lynx. Seals, walruses, Arctic foxes, white bears, and a few reindeer constitute the zoology of the Russian isles, which are occasionally hunted by the inhabitants of Meyen.

In "merrie England" January is a favourite month with sportsmen, as in open weather hunting may be had to perfection, and during a frost pheasant, wildfowl shooting, skating, and golfing will circulate the blood and enliven the spirits.



STEEL BELL-CASTING.

A NUMBER of ladies and gentlemen assembled recently at the works of Messrs. Naylor, Vickers, and Co., Millsands, Sheffield, to witness the casting of the largest steel bell—which was, we believe, also the largest casting in steel—ever produced in this country.

Fenced stages had been erected for the accommodation of the spectators in situations commanding a good view of the operations. A large iron vessel, plugged at the bottom, was placed in the pit, above the mould, to act as a funnel, and the crucibles of steel was poured into it from the crucibles. The emptying of the crucibles (105, containing 56lb. each) into the funnel excited much interest, requiring a great amount of skill, care, and nerve. The men had all been told off into companies, each man having an assigned post and a fixed portion of the work. The carrying and emptying of the crucibles is a painful and difficult task, but it was performed with the utmost order and celerity, the whole of the crucibles being brought up from the furnaces and emptied in the brief space of six minutes. The moment that part of the process was finished the plug was drawn from the bottom of the funnel by means of a crane. The fiery liquid then ran into the mould in a copious and uninterrupted stream, and the work of casting was complete. When the metal was sufficiently cooled to permit of an examination, it was found that the huge casting was perfectly sound. The weight of the casting is 2 tons 12 cwt., or 5824 lb., and the dimensions are:—Height, 6 feet 3 inches; diameter at the mouth, 5 feet 2 inches; thickness at the sound bow (where the clapper strikes), 4¼ inches.

Messrs. Naylor, Vickers, and Co. have but recently added the casting of bells to the other branches of their trade in steel. They cast their first bell in 1856, and have since turned out no less than 1900. A large expansion of the trade is anticipated from the fact that steel is considerably cheaper than "bell metal," and, being also stronger, a much smaller weight suffices for any required result, thus making the difference between the price of the two kinds of bells even greater than is represented by the difference in the cost of material per weight.

The order for the large bell is from Messrs. Conroy and O'Connor, of San Francisco, and it is to be used as a fire-alarm-bell in that city.

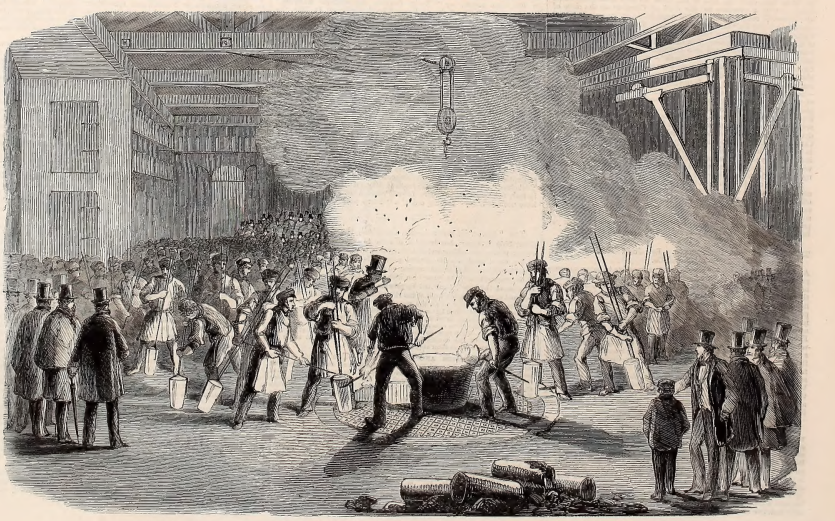
THE PAKINGTON TESTIMONIAL.

SINCE the Exhibition of 1851 the stride in advance which our artists have made in ornamental works is very encouraging. This has been especially the case with the workers in the precious metals. At no other period in art history has the advancement been at once so gratifying and so marked; and the shield, of which we give an Engraving on the first page, as well as other works—representations of which we have from time to time presented to the public, taken from the productions of the first silversmiths of the age—will prove that, if our country has not yet produced an artist of equal skill and genius with Benvenuto Cellini (although this is now doubted by some of the cognoscenti), it at least can boast of those who far excel his predecessors Ghirlandajo, Viviano, and Antonio di Sandro. Nay, as we undoubtedly progress, it may be hoped that, under the influence of a proper and discreet patronage, we may equal, if not surpass, the works of any previous age. In connection with the above remarks we may refer to the shield presented to Sir John S. Pakington last week by the inhabitants of the county and city of Worcester as a work deserving especial notice and commendation. It has been manufactured by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell for Messrs. Manning, of Worcester, to whom, from local associations, the work was intrusted. We have often before illustrated and commended the productions of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell; and the present work, designed and modelled by Mr. H. Armstead, an élève of the firm, is one of extraordinary merit.

The shield, which is forty inches in diameter, is designed to illustrate the important services rendered by Sir J. Pakington locally as chairman of the Quarter Sessions, officially as First Lord of the Admiralty and Secretary of State for the Colonies, and generally as an able advocate of education. It is divided into eight compartments, four being alti and four bassi relievi. The four latter illustrate events in English history relative to her administration of justice, her marine colonies, and the education of her people. The first subject is that of Prince Henry reproved by Judge Gascoigne; the death of Nelson is the second; the third, the landing of Cook in Australasia; the fourth, the presentation of Caxton and his first printed book to Edward IV. by Lord Rivers. The alti-relievi form graceful divisions to the four bassi, and contain at the central portion typical representations, or rather abstract personifications of Justice, the Marine, Education, and Colonisation, whilst at their bases are the portrait models of those who have chiefly distinguished themselves in each department—thus King Alfred, Blake, and Nelson represent our navy; Drake, Cook, and Franklin our discoverers; Henry VI., Wolsey, and Dudley, founders of colleges for education; Somers, Lyttelton, and Coventry legislators. The latter selected as natives of Worcestershire. The inscription is treated in a novel manner, being in pierced letters, forming at once an ornament and a strong border; and the outer edge of the shield consists of a boldly-chased border of oakleaves. The centre of the shield consists of a sunken circle, partly gilt, and richly ornamented with laurel, &c., from which rises the boss or spike.



The whole of the work is of so high a character that when Mr. Hunt had the honour of submitting it to the Prince Consort, to whom he introduced also the artist, his Royal Highness passed upon it the highest possible encomium as a work marking the progress of art in this age; and all who know the Prince's love of art, and the interest he takes in its advancement, will feel the high compliment that was paid.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

IN accordance with the promise made in our December article on the Paris fashions, we present our fair readers with a few ball toilets which we fancy will find favour in their eyes. Terpsichorean fêtes during the past month has debarred from the pursuit of the pleasure generally anticipated from a gay ball. Our season for such festivities has also commenced in good earnest: from Christmas on to Easter our dancing parties are in full force; so that we may be excused for limiting our Illustrations in the present article exclusively to toilettes de bal. We would, however, say a word or two on the prevailing mode for outer garments.

Cloaks are almost universally worn by the beau monde, either of black velvet, trimmed with an abundant lace, or of cloth, with very wide fur borders, collar, and cuffs. The prices of many of these articles, when of first-rate quality, are almost fabulous, and yet they are frequently seen. The burnous cloak, however, in cloth, is the most general, on account of its convenience and its moderate cost. The light-waisted casquin has almost disappeared, and is now only worn by very young persons; whereas, for ladies of a certain age, the fashionable, wide, black silk pelisse, with large ornamented cape, is a warm, convenient, and very comfortable covering.

Bonnets of velvet are the fitting head-gear for the winter season: the crown is generally of a light colour, which takes off a little of their somewhat heavy appearance. Wadded satin bonnets are also very recherché, trimmed with velvet of a darker shade than the body. The shape still lowers behind: the more rapid the descent the better the taste for the moment. The general size remains unaltered.

CASTING THE GREAT STEEL BELL FOR SAN FRANCISCO, AT THE WORKS OF MESSRS. NAYLOR, VICKERS, AND CO., MILLSANDS, SHEFFIELD.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. This elegant ball dress is of white brocaded velvet, designed with poppies and leaves, trimmed with green satin ribbon, and white satin and lace. The corsage, square in front and behind, is of the same material as the skirt, except the front, which is of white satin, crossed by four graduating bands and bows in the middle of green satin. Each shoulder is also surmounted by a green satin bow, from which proceed two lace lapels meeting gracefully at the point of the waist. The small puffed sleeve is likewise trimmed with lace, and furnished with a little green bow at the side. The skirt is attached by wide flat plaits, rises a little in front, so as to show the foot, and falls in a proportionate train behind. The handdress consists of a band of deep scarlet velvet, studded with gilt star ornaments; from its band that hides the comb hangs a pretty leaflike ornament in black lace, which descends almost to the shoulder.

Fig. 2. Robe of white moire antique. A large lace flounce, attached fullwise, is the principal feature of this dress, which is trimmed with flowers and leaves both on the skirt and corsage. The front of the corsage is a rather pretty adaptation of the mixed festoon of leaves and flowers, the centre being occupied by a white or a red rose. The hair, arranged so as to be in keeping with the rest of the costume, imparts to this toilet a floral aspect of the most pleasing character.

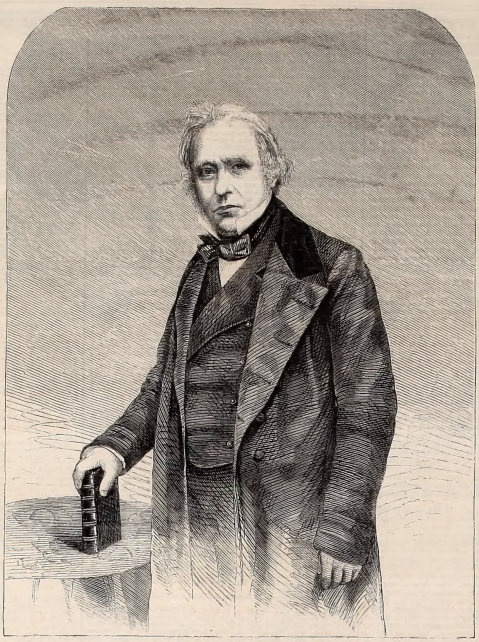

Fig. 3. The underskirt of this dress is of dark pink silk; the dress itself is of white tulle ornamented with white crape and small white blonde, and narrow cherry-coloured ribbon velvet. Three distinct rows of it are placed above the flounces, each of which is trimmed with the velvet mentioned, and with tulle in small festoons. The corsage descends rather low to a sharp point, and is ornamented with a drapery of crape in regular plaits, which are surmounted with three narrow rows of tulle. To the centre of the corsage, immediately below the drapery, is attached a bow of tulle trimmed with three rows of cherry velvet, and bordered with narrow blonde. The sleeve is composed of two narrow flounces of tulle falling over the puff in the same material. The headdress consists of bay-leaves intermixed with coral ornaments.

LORD MACAULAY.

THE Right Hon. Thomas Babington Macaulay, Baron Macaulay, of Rothley, in the county of Leicester, the great poet, orator, historian, and politician, was the son of Zachary Macaulay, Esq., a wealthy African merchant, and the stanch and honoured advocate of the abolition of slavery, and was the grandson of the Rev. John Macaulay, A.M., Minister of Inverary, by his wife, a Campbell. He was born at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, on the 25th of October, 1800, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the Craven Scholarship and some of the highest University honours. He was for several years a Fellow of Trinity College, having got the fellowship at the October competition of 1822. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, and was eventually, in 1849, made a Bencher of that inn. He was also a Commissioner of Bankrupts, but literature and politics, rather than law, were to be the great sources of Macaulay's advancement. He began to write early. His first contribution to the Edinburgh Review was the brilliant article on Milton, an essay which at once fixed public attention, and showed that its author was no ordinary person. Macaulay entered Parliament in 1830 as member for the borough of Calne, and soon distinguished himself on the Whig side of the House as an able and eloquent debater. He held, under Lord Grey's Government, the office of Secretary to the Board of Control. His conduct with reference to the Negro Emancipation question was equally honourable to himself and to Lord Grey. Unable to vote with Lord Grey's Government, he tendered his resignation, which Lord Grey refused to accept, and at his urgent request, Mr. Macaulay remained in office. In 1832 he was returned to Parliament for Leeds. He was subsequently nominated fifth member of the Supreme Council of India, and resigned both his seat and his office at home. The tedium of the outward voyage to the East was beguiled by the composition of his remarkable essay on Lord Bacon.

Mr. Macaulay, when in India, drew up a code of laws for the Indian empire. He came back to England in 1839, and had the affliction of learning, immediately on his arrival, the death of his revered father, which had taken place but a short time previously. He was, on his return, appointed to the office of Secretary at War, and, in the following year, was elected M.P. for the city of Edinburgh, which seat he afterwards lost in 1847, on refusing to vote for the abolition of the grant to Maynooth College. His literary fame had by this time greatly increased. His splendid essays on Clive and Hastings were the theme of general admiration. In 1842 he published his "Lays of Ancient Rome."

Mr. Macaulay was Secretary at War from 1839 to 1841, and was Paymaster of the Forces from 1846 to 1848. On his retirement from the latter office, and after being, in 1848, elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University, he devoted his time mainly to advancing the composition of his "History of England," and the two first volumes appeared at the close of 1848. Their success, and the impression they made on the public mind, are of too recent and common knowledge to need more than mention here. They were universally read; and, whatever might be the difference of opinion on the author's impartiality and accuracy as an historian, there could be but one judgment in favour of the magnificence of his style and the interest of his narrative. In 1855 the third and fourth volumes of this History were published, and maintained its popularity. Some of Mr. Macaulay's statements, however, met with earnest contradiction, and none more than his attack on the illustrious William Penn. Mr. Paget's clever essay, among others, was regarded as a complete refutation of the charges brought against Penn by Macaulay. Nevertheless, this "History of England" will make its author rank for ever by the side of Rapin, Hume, Lingard, and the other great historians of his country. Mr. Macaulay, who had been named Professor of Ancient History in the Royal Academy in 1850, was raised to the Peerage as Baron Macaulay the 10th of September, 1857; but his valuable career was then on the close. His constitution had been shattered by repeated attacks of disease of the heart, and he gradually yielded to the malady. His death, to the great and general public sorrow, occurred on the 28th ult., at his suburban house, Holly Lodge, Kensington; and thus the year 1859 is, at its conclusion, remarkable for the loss of two among the most brilliant writers of this or any age—viz., Macaulay himself, and his distinguished contemporary, Washington Irving, both essayists and historians, whose works are classics already. Lord Macaulay was never married.

The funeral of Lord Macaulay will take place in Westminster Abbey on Monday next, January 9, at one o'clock. The members of the Legislature, and the gentlemen of distinction in letters, science, or art, who may be desirous to show their respect to his memory, are requested to signify their wish to Mr. C. Buxton, M.P., 7, Grosvenor-crescent, as the space in the part of the Abbey chosen for the interment is limited. No one can be admitted without a ticket.

An Engraving of the Funeral Ceremony will be given in this Journal.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The racing men inaugurated their 1860 season betimes, on the second day of the New Year, with a Trial Handicap at Manchester, in which ten started; Mr. Shelley and Luke Snowdon (who, like Goater, made a great and most deserved advance in public favour last year) winning it with Lord Berkeley. It is rather remarkable that this gentleman and the same jockey should have led off at Lincoln, in 1859, with Lifeboat. Umpire has reappeared on the Newmarket Heath at exercise, and opinions of course differ about him most widely. We doubt very much, even with Marlow to ride him, that he will be found the dreadfully dangerous Derby horse which so many of the trainers seem to suppose. He would be well supported in the betting if the layers would agree to 9 to 1, for which the takers hold out with equal pertinacity. Mainstone has "hardened" since the Premier rode so many miles before breakfast lately to see him, and expressed himself fully satisfied with his fine son of King Tom. The Wizard is becoming a good Two Thousand favourite, and has grown into a fine fifteen-three horse; while the public's Derby fancy for the sma t Little Drone in the same stable has decidedly abated. Cramond is said to be making up into a very Derby-like horse, and a good joke is told of his having so far declined the conventional stable attentions of a cat as not only to worry it, but eat about half its carcase for a relish. Some bold man has taken 100 to 1 about Grenadier; and certainly the layer may safely offer to eat him if he wins. Reading holds its steeplechases on Wednesday and Thursday.

Rifleman has been sold to go to Russia, in the place of Daniel O'Rourke, and the price is said to have been fifteen hundred guineas. The Sporting Magazine of this month (which has a picture of Treadwell, late huntsman to Mr. Farquharson) mentions as an on dit that Mr. Hargreaves asked the agents of Mr. Petroffski £5000 for Teddington, but that £3000 or £3500 was the utmost point to which they would go. Footstool has been sold by Captain Barlow, of Hasketon, to go to Melton Mowbray, where his stout Saddler blood and well-known powers of getting through dirt, and carrying a high weight for a distance, will, no doubt, be duly recognised when he is in Drayton's old box. Two blood foals unfortunately anticipated the new year, which the French Government has begun well with—the Flying Dutchman, Cossack, and The Baron in the Imperial Haras. From some very interesting statistics respecting our own Royal stud in the Life we find that in 1851-59 the fifty-seven colts and sixty-four fillies brought to the hammer realised 24,243 gs., being an average of more than 184 gs. each. Out of the thirty-eight mares which produced them Eulogy has been the most fortunate, with 2676 gs. for her six; and Yellow Jack (1000 gs.), FitzRoland (410 gs.), Trumpeter (290 gs.), and Imperieuse (480 gs), have been the principal cracks among them.

We regret to have to announce the death of Lord John Scott, which took place early on Tuesday morning at Cawston, near Rugby. His Lordship was very fond of otter-hunting and every other manly sport; but he always preferred breeding to racing, although his blue and orange was seen on many a racecoure, and was repeatedly borne—by The Reiver, Miserrima, Hobbie Noble, Cannobie, Pug Orrock, &c.—to victory. He was especially fond of Pantaloon, who died at Cawston; and it was from his union with Phryne (by Touchstone) that the first three sprang, as well as Elthiron and Windhound. The latter horse was, we believe, still his property; but some time since he sold Phryne and her daughter Blanche of Middlebie with a lot to Mr. Merry, who had some years previously given 6500 gs. for Hobbie Noble. Melbourne, Birdcatcher, Cannobie, and Oulston were also at the Cawston stud-farm in turn; and, in fact, a better-ordered establishment, under his groom Hemming, was not to be found in the midland counties. On a summer day it was a perfect picture, with its neat paddocks, its ivy-clad house, and the thick-wooded belt of fox covers behind. His Lordship was in his fifty-first year, and died of a gradual wasting, which had for some days previous forbid all hope.

All the sixty-four Waterloo Cup nominations are taken up, and Mr. A. Dalzell has again been appointed judge. Already nearly 100 gs. have been collected as a tribute to the veteran Nightingale. The Tyneside Club holds its meeting on Monday; the Caledonian Club (O) on Monday, &c.; Scorton (O) on Tuesday and Wednesday; Hewell and Southport on Wednesday; Baldock (O) on Wednesday and the two next days; and Brougham and Whinfell on Thursday, &c. There has been some extraordinary shooting at Longleat lately—viz., 2204 head in two days, from five guns, in one wood, half of which was beaten one day, and half the next.

Mr. Tailby's had a splendid run of an hour and twenty minutes on Monday last. On the previous Tuesday they drew Ranksborough blank, but found a rare fox at Cold Overton Park Wood. He first made his point for Owston Wood, but was beaded short back through the wood, towards Barleythorpe, leaving Ranksborough on the right, down the valley by Cold Overton, and so on to Somerby, where he was again headed. Bending for Pickwell, and leaving it on the left, he ran back up the valley to his old quarters, after giving them forty minutes over a splendid country, with scarcely a ploughed field in it.

On Friday week the Quorn found a ringing bad fox at the Curate's Gorse. They then drew Ella's and Munday's Gorse blank, but Walton Thorns produced a capital fox, which broke up the valley, crossing the green lane, and leaving the plantation on the left. He then made a half circle, pointing to Cossington Gorse, and straight on for Prestwold, where he went to ground, after a satisfactory gallop. On Monday his Lordship's hounds found at Barkley Holt, and had but little sport, losing him near Gaddesby. They then trotted off to Cream Gorse and drew it, as well as Ashby Pasture, blank. Thorpe Trussell's had, however, a good fox ready, which made his point for Great Dalby, by the Windmill, near Gunn's Lodge, leaving Sir Francis Burdett's cover on the left; mounting Burrow Hills, he went past the Punchbowl and Pickwell, and straight up the valley nearly to Langham, where the hounds most suddenly threw up their heads. The time was fifty-four minutes, and the distance by the crow nine miles, but they ran it nearly twelve. In this magnificent run the noble Master and his Countess went admirably, and so did Earl Wilton, Mr. Gilmour (on his new purchase, Coltness), Captain Lloyd, Mr. Burbidge, &c.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Sir Robert Alexander, Bart., of St. James's-place, Westminster, was proved in London by John Wallis Alexander, Esq., his second son, the sole executor. He has left his property equally amongst his three sons and only daughter.

The will of Miss Sarah Disraeli, of Gloucester-place, Hyde Park, formerly of Ailsa-park Villas, Twickenham, was proved in London by her brother, Ralph Disraeli, Esq., the sole executor. The personalty £4000. She has bequeathed her funded property, money, and shares in public companies equally amongst her three brothers, the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, M.P., P.C., Ralph Disraeli, Esq., and James Disraeli, Esq. The residue of her property she leaves to her brother Ralph Disraeli. She has left to her attendant Mary Wright a legacy of £60 free of legacy duty.

Esther Fitzmaurice (wife of the Hon William Edward Fitzmaurice), formerly of Hamilton Lodge, Kensington-gore, and late of Hyde Park-gate, was administered to by her husband, and a limited probate granted by the London Court to the effects, property, and estates, over which she had, by certain deeds, a power of appointment, and which she has left to her husband for life, and then to her children: the jewels, plate, and such like property she has left to him absolutely.

The will of Dame Hannah O'Conor (widow of Sir Richard O'Conor) was proved in London by her daughter, Ellen Margaret Ross O'Conor, the sole executrix. Mr. Richard H. Shiel, of Liverpool, is a joint trustee with her, and to whom she leaves £50, and a like sum to Mr. Dimsmore, of the India House. To her daughter Eliza de Watteville she has bequeathed the interest of £5000, and the principal, at her decease, to her children; and to her granddaughter Hannah de Watteville £2000 absolutely. The Scientific American announces a machine for picking geese, the result of a number of years' labour, and one of the most ingenious pieces of mechanism ever seen. It not only plucks the feathers, but separates the long ones from the short ones while passing through the machine. It will pick forty-five geese per hour.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Throughout nearly the whole of the week, partly to provide for an immense amount of paper falling due on the 4th, the demand for money has been unusually active for the time of year, and the rates of discount have been freely supported. In Lombard-street the lowest quotations for the best short paper have been 2⅜ to 2½ per cent, and three months' bills have commanded fully 2½.

On the whole, a full average money business has been transacted in National Securities, and prices have shown a tendency to improve. Consols for Account, having touched 95⅞, and the Reduced 96. The Unfunded Debt has, likewise, continued very firm, but the dealings in it have not been to say extensive. Indian Stocks and Debentures have ruled very firm, and the public are still purchasing largely.

Two fresh loans have made their appearance—viz., one for the Government of the Cape for £50,000 in Six per Cent Bonds, and one for Canada of £2,800,000 at Five per Cent. The Canadian Government intimate that they are desirous of consolidating the entire debt of the colony, and that the sum now proposed to be raised, will be applied to the redemption of various loans raised in Canada. The Municipal Loan Fund Bonds, amounting to about £1,250,000, and chiefly held in this country, will be taken in lieu of cash. The actual increase in the debt of Canada will, we find, be only £200,000; but, no doubt, if the loan be successful, there will be a large annual saving of interest. The first payment of 8 per cent will become due on the 1st proximo, and the last on the 15th of January, 1861. The subscription list will close on the 10th inst. Already it is tolerably well filled, and the new stock has been quoted at par to 2 per cent premium.

Large supplies of bullion—about £800,000, chiefly from Australia, the United States, and the West Indies—have come to hand; but nearly the whole of them have been taken for export to the Continent. The withdrawals from the Bank of England have ceased. The steamer for the East has taken out £276,176 in specie—viz., £31,139 in gold and the rest silver—all on private account.

The prospectus of the new Bank of Turkey has been issued. The capital is fixed at £1,000,000, with power to increase it to £3,000,000. The shares have been done at 1¼ to 1½ premium.

At the half-yearly meeting of the London Dock Company a dividend of £1 10s. per share was declared. The amount carried forward is £143,609. The directors of the Colonial Bank have declared a dividend of 5 per cent for the past half-year.

Mexican dollars have been disposed of at 61⅞d.; and bar silver has realised 62d. per ounce standard.

Home Stocks were steady on Monday, as follows:—Bank Stock, 227 228½; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 95¾ ⅞; Consols for Account, 95¾ ⅞; India Debentures, 1859, 98½ ¾; Ditto Bonds, enfaced paper, Five per Cent, 96½ ⅝; Ditto Five per Cents, 104⅝; Exchequer Bills, 28s. to 31s. prem. On Tuesday prices generally were very firm, and the market was remarkably steady:—Bank Stock sold at 228½ 228; the Reduced and New Three per Cents, 95¾ 96; Consols for Account, 95⅞ ⅝; India Debentures, 1858, 98½ ¾; Ditto, 1859, 98⅜ ⅝ ½; Ditto Bonds, 7s. prem.; Ditto, enfaced paper, 96½ ¼; Ditto, Five-and-a-half per Cents, 103½; Ditto New Five per Cents, 104⅜ ½; and Exchequer Bills, 28s. to 31s. prem. The dealings on Wednesday were somewhat numerous, and prices ruled very firm:—Bank Stock was 227½ 227; the Reduced and New Three per Cents sold at 95⅞ 96; Consols for Account, 95⅞ ⅝ ⅞; India Debentures, 1858, 98⅞; Ditto, 1859, 98⅜ ⅝; Ditto Bonds, 8s. to 10s. prem.; Ditto, enfaced paper, 96⅝; Ditto Five-and-a-Halfper Cents, 104; Ditto New Five per Cents, 104⅜ ¼; Exchequer Bills, 28s. to 31s. prem.; India Stock for Account was 223½. Owing to the resignation of Count Walewski Home Stocks were less active on Thursday, and prices ruled easier:—Consols were done at 95½ ⅝ ⅞; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 95⅞ ⅞; India Debentures, 98⅞ ⅞; Ditto, enfaced paper, 96⅝; Ditto Five per Cents, 104¼ ⅜; and Exchequer Bills, 29s. to 32s. prem.

The amount of business transacted in the Foreign House has been somewhat extensive. Prices generally have ruled very firm, and in some instances they have had an upward tendency. THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Jan. 2.—Although only a limited supply of home-grown wheat was on offer in to-day's market the demand was in a most inactive state. Good and fine samples were mostly disposed of at full prices, but low and damp qualities moved off slowly, at barely late rates. In foreign wheat—the show of which was by no means extensive—very little was passing, on former terms. Floating cargoes of grain commanded very little attention. On the whole, an average business was passing in barley, at full rates of currency. New malt maintained its previous value, but old parcels were very dull. We had a steady consumptive inquiry for oats, and fine qualities were rather dearer. Beans gave way 1s. to 2s. per quarter. White peas maintained late rates, but grey and maple qualities declined 1s. per quarter. Flour was unaltered in value, and the demand for it was by no means active.

Jan. 4.—Fine wheat, barley, and oats moved off steadily, at very full prices. All other kinds of produce were a dull inquiry, at Monday's quotations.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s. to 46s.; ditto, white, 38s to 41s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s. to 46s.; rye, 28s. to 31s.; grinding barley, 28s to 28s.; distilling ditto, 28s. to 30s; malting ditto, 33s. to 44s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 63s. to 66s.; brown ditto, 48s. to 49s.; Kingston and Ware 54s to 66s.; Chevalier, 67s. to 71s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 20s. to 25s.; potato ditto, 25s. to 29s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 21s.; ditto, white, 20s. to 27s.; tick beans, 35s. to 41s.; grey peas, 34s. to 35s; maple, 38s. to 39s.; white, 36s. to 40s.; boilers, 38s. to 40s. per quarter; town-made flour, 41s. to 43s; town households, 36s. to 37s.; country marks, 30s. to 36s. per 280 lb.; American, 23s. to 27s. per barrel; French, 29s. to 36s. per sack.

Seeds.—Canary is dull in sale, and lower to purchase. All other seeds move off slowly, at about previous currencies.

Linseed, English, crushing, 48s. to 52s; Calcutta, 48s. to 49s.; hempseed, 35s. to 36s. per quarter; coriander, 15s. to 18s. per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s. to 14s.; ditto, white, 15s. to 16s.; tares, 7s. to 7s. 6d. per bushel. English rapeseed, 50s. to 60s. per quarter; linseed cakes, English, £9 10s. to £10 0s.; ditto, foreign, £9 10s. to £10 15s.; rape cakes, £5 10s. to £6 0s. per ton; canary, 58s. to 62s. per quarter; red clover seed, 52s. to 60s. white ditto, 62s. to 90s. per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d. to 7½d.; of household ditto, 5d. to 6½d. per 4-lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 44s. 2d.; barley, 31s. 8d.; oats, 21s. 5d.; rye, 35s. 1d.; beans, 39s. 7d.; peas, 37s. 8d.

The Six Weeks' Averages.—Wheat, 44s. 0d.; barley, 35s. 6d.; oats 21s. 8d.; rye, 31s. 1d; beans, 40s. 9d.; peas, 38s. 6d.

English Grain Sold last Week.—Wheat, 122,218; barley, 83,391; oats, 12,481; rye, 78; beans, 6514; peas, 2289 quarters.

Tea.—There is a steady business doing in this article, and late rates are well supported. Common sound Congou is quoted at 1s 3½d per lb.

Sugar.—All raw qualities have changed hands steadily, at an advance in the quotations of from 6d to 1s. per cwt. Growing Madras has realised 46s. to 47s.; brown Penang, 35s. to 38s.; Bengal, 41s. to 43s. per cwt. Refined goods sell freely, on rather higher terms.

Coffee.—Our market, generally, is in a healthy state, and prices show a tendency to advance.

Rice.—Fine qualities are the turn dearer; but the business doing is not to say extensive.

Provisions.—Most qualities of Irish butter continue dull in sale. Foreign parcels move off slowly, and the best Dutch are offering at 116s. per cwt. In the value of English very little change has taken place. Bacon maintains its previous value; but most other kinds of provisions are a dull inquiry.

Tallow.—Although the demand is flat, prices are supported. P. Y. C., on the spot, is quoted at 57s. 6d.; and, for the spring, 57s. 3d. per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil sells slowly, at 27s. 6d. per cwt. on the spot. In other oils very little is doing. Spirits of turpentine, 33s 6d. to 34s 6d per cwt. Rough is held at 10s.

Spirits.—Scarcely any change has taken place in the value of rum, and the transactions are by no means numerous; proof Leewards, 1s. 10d. to 2s. per gallon. Brandy and grain spirits support previous rates.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 10s. to £4 4s.; clover ditto, £3 10s to £5 5s.; and straw, £1 5s to £1 10s. per load.

Coals.—Best house coals, 19s. 6d. to 20s; seconds, 18s. 3d. to 19s. 6d.; Hartley's, 14s. 3d. to 15s 6d.; and manufacturers', 13s. 3d. to 14s. 6d. per ton.

Hops.—For all new hops—the show of which is very moderate—the demand continues steady, at fully the late advance in the quotations. Yearlings command extreme rates.

Wool.—The trade is very inactive; nevertheless, prices are generally well supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies are moderately good, and the demand is steady, at from 65s. to 135s. per ton.

Metropolitan Cattle Market.—(Thursday, January 5.)—About an average supply of beasts was on offer in our market to-day. All prime breeds moved off steadily, at fully Monday's currency. Otherwise, the beef trade was inactive: nevertheless, prices were well supported. We have to report a good demand for sheep of prime quality, at extreme rates. Longwools were inactive, but not cheaper. The supply on offer was rather limited. Prime calves were scarce and in request, at very full prices; but inferior qualities of veal ruled somewhat heavy. The pork trade was firm, on former terms. In milch cows, however, very little was doing. Per 8lbs to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 8d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 10d. to 4s. 4d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; prime Scots, &c., 4s. 10d. to 5s.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 6d. to 4s.; second quality ditto, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.; prime coarse-woolled sheep, 4s. 8d. to 4s. 10d.; prime Southdown ditto, 5s. 2d. to 5s. 6d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 8d.; prime small ditto, 4s. 10d. to 5s. 2d.; large hogs, 3s. 6d. to 3s. 10d.; neat small porkers, 4s. to 4s. 10d.; suckling calves, 22s. to 23s.: and quarter-old store pigs, 23s. to 29s. each. NEW MUSIC, &c.

THE ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM,
as CHAPPELL'S, 49 and 50, New Bond-street.

In answer to the statements made by Messrs. Rosney and Sons in their last advertisement, Chappell and Co. beg distinctly to repeat that the Testimonials of Professor Bennett and Mr. Macfarren, if not of the exact pattern published by Messrs. Rosney and Sons, are of the same purport, and, as regards the instruments they were obtained upon Messrs. Rosney and Sons have themselves they had a factory, or had made a single Harmonium.

The letters subjoined, together with the dates of the above-mentioned Testimonials (if Messrs. Rosney will publish them), will clearly establish this fact.

From Dr. BIRKBALT.

The Harmonium which Mr. Evans has with me about two years before, and is now in use at my house, is by Schmidt and Mr. C. Potter tells me that Messrs. Alexandre's instrument had worked upon during the week. This gentleman told me that his charge for the operation would be £5 for any number of stops, but I made no consentment of the fact that the instrument satisfactorily. My impression was that Messrs. Alexandre's charge would be £10 10s. The mechanical beauty of the last does not plead for the Harmonium. Mr. Potter answered nothing, simplified nothing, but had merely filed away the wood which prevented the action working, and had been accomplished by M. ALEXANDRE in a more satisfactory way long before, by the application of a piece of cloth.

EDWARD F. ROMANEY,

From CRAMER, BEALE, and CO.

Having seen the Harmonium upon which Mr. Evans obtained his prize medal, we have much pleasure in stating that it was one of the most valuable instruments we had ever seen. Mr. Evans then said that he should not make any alterations or additions to instruments of ALEXANDRE'S manufacture because he found them the best.

CRAMER, BEALE, and CO.
December 27, 1859

It is the duty of the public to judge which party has "distorted facts," whether it is justifiable or proper to use Testimonials given with reference to an instrument in favour of another of different construction and quality.

It is also suggested that, for some few weeks past Messrs. Rosney have had a manufactory. The merit of their own manufacture, in comparison with that of ALEXANDRE'S, will best be shown by the following Testimonials, given upon a real examination of the two Harmoniums, side by side.

Having carefully examined, side by side, the various Harmoniums, English and French, we are bound to say that those made by ALEXANDRE, of Paris, are decidedly to us, especially to the most material points—quality of tone and power.

J. P. BURROWES. FRANK MORI.
E. ROGERS. S. P. RIMBAULT.
C. H. RUSSELL. BRINLEY RICHARDS.
W. H. CALCOTT. JOHN HULLAH.
W. VINCENT WALLACE.

Messrs. Rosney further state that Mr. Evans' alterations to the ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM "converted an ordinary organ to the use of a complete instrument." How they can reconcile this with the fact that Mr. Evans has had the Harmonium now 12 months before it is for them to decide. Mr. Evans offered his plans to Messrs. Chappell and Co., but they did not consider that they would be of sufficient importance to form a considerable item of power, and, knowing well their inability to derangement.

Messrs. Rosney, of course, say whether or not Messrs. Rosney's statement in regard to Herr Kapp is correct; but they will not deny that Herr Kapp has played on the Harmonium by Messrs. Alexandre, and has written from Riga to Parliament, to Messrs. Alexandre, to say, especially to the most material points—quality of tone and power.

W. VINCENT WALLACE.

From HENRY ENGEL, Professor of the Harmonium at the R al Academy of Music.

I have great pleasure in stating that the new pipeless, ALEXANDRE'S Harmoniums are superior to all others, whether made in England or on the Continent. The ALEXANDRE'S Harmoniums have the right to state that they have received especially and that in the Exhibition of 1851 the instrument shown by Mr. Evans to St. James's Hall, with his name on it, was not an ALEXANDRE, was one of ALEXANDRE'S.

From HENRY BLOMFIELD, Esq.

Dear Sir, Sackville-street, 7th, 1859.

I have much pleasure in sending you my opinion of ALEXANDRE'S Harmoniums. I have long been accustomed to consider those instruments pre-eminent for delicacy of touch, and variety of tone, but I have recently made between them and Harmoniums by other makers that which has convinced me that they are not attained any estimate of their merits. Yours truly, JAMES BLOMFIELD.

From G. A. MACFARREN, Esq.

About two years ago I wrote Mr. Evans's opinion of his improvements in the ALEXANDRE HARMONIUM, expressing my belief that assure that the instrument was ALEXANDRE'S, or of the ordinary kind. I have since had the opportunity of examining the new ALEXANDRE'S, and find that the recent improvements, produced in different means, with the opportunity of being less constrictive than the old system. Yours, &c. G. A. MACFARREN. The Harmonium exhibited by Mr. EVANS which I have heard is certainly inferior both in sweetness and power to those of Mr. ALEXANDRE in the same price.

From Dr. RIMBAULT, Author of many celebrated Works on the Harmonium.

For excellence of tone, delicacy of touch, and power of expression, the ALEXANDRE Harmonium is decidedly two near under manufacture. I have had constant opportunities of hearing the Harmoniums of various makers, French, German, and English, and have no hesitation in giving the preference to those of ALEXANDRE. I have also had an opportunity of hearing Mr. ALEXANDRE, the English, unless they were ALEXANDRE'S reeds, are decidedly the worst of all. For the purpose of the Exhibition, where power is required, I recommend the Patent Model; and for the chamber, where sweetness and roundness of tone is required, I prefer the Model No. 3. Compared with other Instruments, in my opinion, they are very superior. Yours truly, EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

From JAMES TURLE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Having heard and examined the celebrated Harmoniums separately manufactured by EVANS, DEBAIN, and ALEXANDRE, I feel no hesitation in giving the preference to those of ALEXANDRE.

JAMES TURLE.

From W. VINCENT WALLACE, Esq.

90, Berners-street, Dec 20th, 1859.

I have much pleasure in stating how perfectly I have been with the ALEXANDRE Harmoniums, more particularly those classed as the Drawing-room Model, which I have had in sight as that of a first-rate Piano, and the many beautiful effects, produced by the different stops, render it a most valuable addition to the Concert-room. I prefer the system of the ALEXANDRE Harmoniums, of every description, to surpass those of any other maker.

Believe me, yours truly,
W. VINCENT WALLACE.

ROYAL ACADEMY MEDALS
FOR 1859.

THE award of gold medals this year by the Royal Academy appears to have been restricted to one in Sculpture and one in Architecture, none having been given in Historical or Landscape Painting, the Council not deeming the productions in either class worthy of the distinction.

In sculpture the prize has been awarded to Mr. Lynn for a group representing "Lycoan Imploring Achilles to Spare his Life." The subject is one well calculated for the illustration of a strong contrast, both in the physique and morale: Achilles, a giant in stature and strength, and full of unrelenting hate; Lycoan, an effeminate stripling, debased by abject terror. Mr. Lynn has made the most of his materials, and has produced a powerful and effective group, admirably simple and classic in treatment, and in which he adheres pretty closely to the spirit of the text:—

Thus, while he spoke, the Trojan, pale with fears,
Approached and sought his knees
with suppliant tears:
Loth as he was to yield his youthful breath,
And his soul shiv'ring at th' approach of death
Achilles rais'd the spear, prepar'd to wound;
He kiss'd his feet, extended on the ground
And while above the spear suspended stood,
Longing to dip its thirsty point in blood,
One hand embrac'd them close, one
stopt the dart,
While thus those melting words attempt his heart.
* * * * *
These words, attended with a show'r of tears,
The youth addressed to unrelenting ears:
Talk not of life or ransom (he replies),
Patroclus dead, whoever meets me
dies:
In vain a single Trojan sues for grace;
But least, the sons of Priam's hateful race.
* * * * *
Die thou, he said; and, as the word he spoke,
The fainting stripling sunk beneath the stroke:
His hand forgot its grasp, and left the spear
While all his trembling frame confest his fear.

The gold medal in Architecture has been awarded to Mr. Ernest George, of Albert-square, Clapham-road, for "A Design for a Metropolitan Hotel." This design is in the Gothic style, freely treated, with some continental features introduced. The form of the building is quadrangular, and there are some novelties in the plan. The inner court, which is approached by carriage-ways on each side, is to be covered in with glass. The ground floor in front, with a mezzanine over, is intended to be devoted to shops. This arrangement is one which presents considerable obstacles to architectural effect, in the struggle after which we find the shops in many cases—as, for instance, at Her Majesty's Theatre—hidden and darkened by projecting colonnades. In the present instance we think the architect has shown great ingenuity, and with considerable success, in the treatment of this as of other portions of the building. An unbroken line is preserved for the street frontages, which is a great advantage where shops are concerned, the effect of light and shade being obtained by recessing portions of the structure above the shops to the depth of a balcony.

On the inner side of the ground floor, fronting the courtyard, are arranged the kitchens, manager's and clerks' rooms, servants' hall, and other necessary offices.

The first floor, on which are placed all the principal rooms, is approached by grand staircases, situated near to the entrances. These rooms consist of banqueting and coffee rooms, with their separate drawing-rooms; ladies' coffee-room, library, reading and news rooms, billiard and card rooms; also a spacious assembly or ball room, with orchestra, and refreshment and retiring rooms adjoining. On the same floor are grouped numerous private suites of rooms for families.

The upper floors are principally devoted to bedrooms and the usual requisites of a grand hotel. About three hundred and fifty sleeping apartments are provided.

The assembly-room, which forms an important feature in the principal elevation, is marked externally by the increased height of the windows, which gives an agreeable variety to the whole, and avoids the monotony which would have been produced by continued repetitions.

"LYCOAN IMPLORING ACHILLES TO SPARE HIS LIFE," THE SCULPTURE TO WHICH WAS AWARDED THE ROYAL ACADEMY GOLD MEDAL FOR 1859.

THE VOLUNTEER CORPS.

THE volunteer movement of the present day may be truly called a military revival, for the martial spirit, although rendered subservient to the arts of peace, never became extinct amongst Englishmen, neither was the idea of a force for the purpose of national defence, beyond that afforded by the standing army, ever entirely abandoned. The nucleus of a civilian army has always existed, to a certain extent, in the yeomanry cavalry; while the link between the Trained Bands that rallied round the standard of Queen Elizabeth and encamped at Tilbury Fort and the Volunteers of '59 has been kept unbroken by the Hon. Artillery Company, a regiment which can claim seniority over any in the regular army, traditionally dating back to the Henrys and the Edwards, and some enthusiasts contend even for an antiquity anterior to the Conquest; but their establishment may be fairly dated from the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. Until the threatening storm which gathered in Spain in 1585 the Trained Bands, although they dealt some hard knocks among themselves, had but little opportunity of making a demonstration against foreign aggression; but they were meantime regularly exercised by experienced officers, and were armed and accoutred according to the idea of the period. The London City Companies alone furnished a body of 5000 volunteers, equipped at their own expense, who encamped at Blackheath, whence they marched to Tilbury, under the command of the Earl of Leicester. It was at this period that the Artillery Company was regularly established on its present footing, although its official date of raising is 1610, just fifty years before that of the Grenadier Guards. The Artillery Company distinguished itself in the suppression of the Gordon Riots in 1780.

The English became awake to the necessity of aiding the national defences by the establishment of a volunteer force in the year 1852; but, owing to the inauguration of the French alliance by the Russian war, the project was for a time abandoned. Two regiments, however, became thoroughly established—the South Devon and the Victoria Rifles.

We have given from time to time an account of the rise and progress of the volunteer movement, and annexed are a few particulars relating to the corps whose uniforms are given on pages 8 and 9 of this week's Number:—

THE SOUTH DEVON stands first in the Rifle Army List. It had originally a company at the head-quarters, Exeter, and a company was afterwards raised at Torquay, and sections at Teignmouth, Exmouth, Dawlish, and Totnes. The battalion has lately been much increased, two companies having been added at Exeter, one at Topsham, one at Dawlish, and one at Newton. The sections extended, the Torquay company raised to a hundred men, and the corps now numbers about seven hundred men. The uniform is rifle-green, with a small braid on the trousers, a waist and shoulder belt of black shining leather, a cap with the Exeter motto, "Semper Fidelis," and a bugle in bronze; that of the officers is the same, with the addition of a red sash, a sword-belt and shoulder-ball of shining black leather, with a silver chain and whistle. They have also a full dress, consisting of a shell-jacket richly braided, and a chaco. The sergeants wear three silver stripes on the arm, and the colour-sergeants silver cross-swords and a crown and bugle. The Instructor of Musketry has silver cross-rifles on the arms and the cap and an infantry sword. The entrance-fee is £1 1s., and the yearly subscription 10s. The weapon in use is the short Enfield rifle.

Second in seniority comes the VICTORIA RIFLES. It was embodied as a rifle club in 1852, and in 1853 enrolled as a rifle regiment. The uniform is rifle-green, richly braided, and a chaco surmounted by a plume is worn in full dress. The head-quarters are at Kilburn, where they have a range of 400 yards for rifle practice. The numerical strength of the corps is about four hundred. The entrance-fee is £1 1s., and the yearly subscription £2. The corps is armed with the short Enfield rifle, at the personal cost of the members. The Victoria Rifles having, as a rifle corps, given the initiative to Middlesex, that county ranks as No. 2 in the Rifle Army List, although the Lancashire companies, particularly that of Liverpool, and also those of the 1st and 2nd Surrey, have had precedence of it in organisation. Middlesex has at present over twenty companies enrolled, and several new ones in course of formation.

THE 2ND, or SOUTH MIDDLESEX, RIFLES was enrolled in June, 1859, and numbers at present between seven and eight hundred members. The uniform is grey, with scarlet facings, and a black, shining waist-belt, with pouch in front, and a forage-cap with plume. The members, when off parade, wear a crimson scarf over the left shoulder. They are armed with short rifles, mostly provided at the personal expense of the members. The yearly subscription is £1 1s., and no entrance-fee. Their head-quarters are at Beaufort House, Walham-green.

THE HIGHGATE RIFLES is a small but highly efficient corps, numbering about seventy members. The uniform is grey, with green facings. It is armed, at the expense of the members, with short rifles. Although numbered the 14th Middlesex, it was one of the first established. The drill-ground is Brook-field, Highgate, and the rifle range at Hornsey wood. Yearly subscription £1 1s., no entrance-fee.

THE MARYLEBONE, or WEST MIDDLESEX, RIFLES.—This corps was enrolled in August, 1859. It numbers at present over four hundred members. The uniform is of grey Cheviot tweed, with facings of black braid and scarlet tracings. The drill-ground is at Lord's Cricket-ground, and the rifle-range, of seven hundred and fifty yards, is at Wormwood Scrubbs. The entrance-fee is 10s. 6d., and the yearly subscription £1 1s. The second company of this corps is intended to consist exclusively of artists.

THE LONDON SCOTTISH RIFLES, numbering over five hundred members, was one of the early enrolled Middlesex corps, although not yet quite in uniform. The drill of this corps takes place at the Tower and at Westminster Hall. It is at present armed with the Government long Enfield rifle. An excellent system has been adopted by the committee for the accommodation of young men wishing to join. They have made an arrangement to supply any member applying for it with a uniform, for which, together with the yearly subscription, they will take quarterly payments. One company, it is intended, shall adopt the kilt.

THE LONDON RIFLE BRIGADE, although, literally speaking, a Middlesex corps, does not number with them, being under the government of the lieutenancy of the city of London. The lieutenancy is composed of a certain number of citizens, the principal being the Lord Mayor and aldermen. They have had from time immemorial the privilege of appointing officers to the Trained Bands. The effective strength of this corps is at present over one thousand. They drill in Sion College, and their rifle-range is at the Crystal Palace. The uniform is rifle-green, richly braided; black, shining belts; and, when in full dress, a chaco is worn. It has a first-class band, under the guidance of an experienced band-master. The entrance-fee is a guinea, and the yearly subscription the same. Some of the members provide their own rifles, and others are armed with the Government long Enfield.

KENT has three companies—THE 1ST, or MAIDSTONE, RIFLES has adopted a rifle-green uniform, with black braid. It is armed with the short Enfield rifle. The annual subscription is 10s., and no entrance-fee. The numerical strength is about one hundred. THE CANTERBURY RIFLES, or 3RD KENT, has a grey uniform, with scarlet facings, and numbers about eighty. THE GREENWICH subdivision uses the short Enfield rifle, and has adopted a uniform of rifle-green, with silver mountings.

SURREY reckons as No. 4 in the Volunteer Rifle Army List, and contains nine distinct corps, beginning with the CAMBERWELL, or 1ST SURREY, RIFLES. This corps is commanded by Mr. Boucher, late of the 5th Dragoon Guards, who is assisted by Rolla Rouse, Esq.; Captain Stephenson, late of the 18th Royal Irish; and other officers appointed from the corps. The corps—which may now be called a battalion—consists of the companies at head-quarters and seven district companies. It was organised early in June, and has been at drill and ball practice all through the summer and autumn. The head-quarters are at Hanover Park, Peckham; and the practice-ground the long range at Woolwich. The uniform is rifle-green, with scarlet facings, richly braided, black morocco belts, and gold ornaments. It has a volunteer band of very respectable pretensions. The members have provided themselves with short rifles at their own expense. The entrance fee is 10s. 6d., with a yearly subscription of £1 1s.

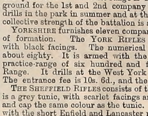
THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY RIFLES consist of four companies, the numerical strength of each being seventy effectives. The uniform is of a light greyish-brown, braided with blue, the trousers are knickerbockers, and the cap is the same colour as the tunic. Two companies are armed with the long Enfield rifle, and two with the short. The entrance-fee is £1, and the yearly subscription the same. Drill takes place in the Armoury, Oxford, and the rifle-range is at Crowley Marsh.

THE EDINBURGH (CITY) RIFLES is a battalion, and numbers eleven companies, amounting in all to about nine hundred men. The uniform is dark grey, with black braid, and the arms the short Enfield rifle. The drill and rifle range is at King's Park, Edinburgh.

STAFFORDSHIRE has four companies already organised, all wearing the same uniform, with a little variation of colour—grey with black braid. Two companies use the long Enfield rifle, and two the short.

THE NOTTINGHAM BATTALION, or ROBIN HOOD RIFLES, is decidedly one of the crack corps. It consists of eight companies, all stationed at Nottingham. The uniform is Lincoln green, with black braid and facings; the mountings are of bronze. The arms used by all the companies are the short Enfield, the Lancaster, and the five-grooved naval rifle. The entrance-fees and subscriptions vary in each company. The yearly subscription in the 1st is £1 1s., with an entrance-fee of £2 12s. 6d. In the 2nd no entrance-fee, and an annual subscription of £1 1s. In the 3rd, and all the others, nearly the same. The rifle-range is Mapperly Plains, and the drill-ground for the 1st and 2nd company the Castle. The 3rd company drills in the park in summer and at the police station in winter. The collective strength of the battalion is about six hundred.

YORKSHIRE furnishes eleven companies, and others are in course of formation. The YORK RIFLES one company, uniform grey, with black facings. The numerical strength of this company is about eighty. It is armed with the short Enfield rifle, and has a practice-range of six hundred and fifty yards at Northern Stray Range. It drills at the West York Dépôt, and in the Guildhall. The entrance fee is 10s. 6d., and the yearly subscription the same.



THE SHEFFIELD RIFLES consists of three companies. The uniform is a grey tunic, with scarlet facings and black braid, dark trousers, and cap the same colour as the tunic. All the companies are armed with the short Enfield and Lancaster rifles, and have long ranges as practice-grounds. The entrance-fee and subscription are the same as the York Rifles. The numerical strength varies from seventy to eighty.

[Our next week's Number will contain an Engraving of the Uniform recommended for volunteer corps by the War-Office committee appointed to consider the question].

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE MARCHIONESS OF BUTE.

THE Most Noble Sophia Frederica Christina, Marchioness of Bute, was the second daughter of that distinguished soldier, senator, and statesman, Francis, second Earl of Moira and first Marquis of Hastings, by his wife, Flora Muir Campbell, in her own right Countess of Loudoun. The Marchioness of Bute was born the 1st of February, 1809, and was married, the 10th of April, 1845 (she was his second wife), to John, second Marquis of Bute, by whom (who died the 18th of March, 1848) she had an only child, John Patrick, third and present Marquis of Bute, a youth, now in his twelfth year. The Marchioness, of a descent most ancient and historic, which is allied with the blood Royal of England and Scotland, was still more ennobled by her personal qualifications of head and heart. Her intellect and amiability made her the charm of all who know her, and her unbounded benevolence and charities brought happiness to the poor for miles around the family estates. It was her liberality which gave to the town of Cardiff the gardens that bear her name. The noble Marchioness edited "The Private Journal of the Marquis of Hastings" and "The Poems of Lady Flora Hastings," whose younger sister she was. Her premature and lamented death occurred, on the 28th ult., at Edinburgh.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL HAMILTON.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL Nicholas Hamilton, K.H., Colonel of the 82nd Foot, who died at his residence in Dublin, on the 13th ultimo, was son of Captain John Hamilton, of H.M. 5th Regiment of Foot, in which regiment the late General had also two brothers. In the year 1796, at the early age of fourteen, Nicholas Hamilton joined his father's regiment (the 5th), and served in 1799 in Holland, in the actions of the 19th of September and the 2nd and 6th of October. In 1805 he embarked for the expedition on the Weser, but was wrecked off the coast of Holland and made prisoner of war. In 1806 he sailed on the secret expedition which eventually proceeded to Buenos Ayres. After the unsuccessful result of this campaign he was one of the hostages given up to the Spanish authorities. In January, 1808, he returned to England, and, in July of the same year, embarked with his regiment with Sir A. Wellesley's (the great Duke of Wellington's) ever-memorable expedition to the Peninsula, and was at the battles of Roleia and Vimiera, as also on the retreat to and battle of Corunna. In 1809 the 5th Regiment formed part of the Walcheren expedition, and took part in the successful attack on the French outposts at Flushing. On the 7th of August, 1809, Hamilton commanded the line of outpickets in front of Flushing, when the French made their most desperate sortie, against which he held firm, though opposed to a force of giant superiority. He on this occasion lost a leg, and one of his brothers was killed. Hamilton received the silver war medal with three clasps. He became a Major-General in 1851, and a Lieutenant-General in 1858. Lieutenant-General Hamilton married Frances Anne, daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Beamish, of Mount Beamish, in the county of Cork, by whom he leaves two sons—Samuel Beamish, Lieutenant-Colonel in her Majesty's 25th Regiment, and William, late Captain in her Majesty's 37th Regiment.

CAPTAIN ATKINS.

CAPTAIN George Francklin Atkins was born in 1822, and was educated at the Kensington Proprietary School, where he gained many distinctions. Thence he proceeded to Addiscombe, and was selected for the Engineers. He went, an Engineer officer, to India in 1842, and was present at the battle of Maharajpore, for which he received a medal. He returned to England in 1846, and started for St. Petersburg to examine the military organisation of the country. He was at the marriage of the Grand Duchess Olga, and an account of the festivities and of his travels are given in the work entitled "Pictures from the North in Pen and Pencil." He was in Paris during the revolution in 1848, and sketches by him of the sacking of the Tuileries appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of 1848. He returned to India, and was, during the late mutiny, executive Engineer in the North-West Provinces, and had to place the hill stations—Simla, Dagshai, Kessowlee—in a state of defence. Sketches of these by him appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. He was fond of ecclesiastical architecture, and a noble church was built by him at Umballa, of which a sketch also appeared in this Journal. In 1858 he came home for health, and published the "Campaign in India," also "Curry and Rice." Another work—"Indian Spices for English Tables"—is in the press. He always exhibited a great taste for the fine arts; he was clever in drawing and painting generally; was a good musician, and had a ready pen. He possessed great kindness of heart, a high moral sense, and deep religious feeling. Captain Atkins died near Paris on the 15th ult.

MRS. JOHN HENRY JENKINSON.

THIS lamented lady, another victim to the too prevalent use of chloroform, was the third daughter of the late Sir Wm. Gordon Cumming, Bart., of Altyre, Morayshire, and wife of John Henry Jenkinson, Esq., second son of the late Bishop of St. David's. Mrs. Jenkinson and her husband were returning south from Scotland, with their infant family, and they stopped on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Baker Cresswell, of Cresswell Hall, Northumberland, and here Mrs. Jenkinson's death occurred thus:—A large family party had retired to rest, having left the drawing-room at half-past eleven o'clock on the evening of the 8th ult., and among them Mrs. Jenkinson, in her usual general health. She was, however, suffering from toothache. It is supposed that, having had an attack during the night, she had risen to apply chloroform from a very small bottle which she had by her for immediate use, but, not succeeding in removing the stopper, she had used a larger bottle kept in reserve. When her husband awoke he found her cold and insensible, overpowered by the dangerous anæsthetic. All that affection and medical skill could suggest was tried in vain. It is supposed death had instantly followed. She was interred on the 15th ult. at Woodhorne, near the family vault of the Cresswells, and by the remains of her own eldest sister and brother-in-law, the late Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Baker Cresswell.

ERRATUM.—In our notice last week of the late Lord Holland it should have been stated that his Lordship was married. He wedded, on the 9th May, 1833, Augusta-Mary, only daughter of George-William, eighth and late Earl of Coventry, but had no surviving issue.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

TURIN.

As the time for the meeting of the Congress draws nigher, men's hopes are hourly growing fainter on the probability of anything like a settlement of the Italian question. Nor, so far as we can at present see, is there anything unreasonable in the gloom of their apprehensions. It will readily be admitted that no very determinate or decisive policy can be adopted towards Italy without the concurrence of a very strong majority of the Powers assembled in Congress—a mere casting vote, or a majority composed of third-rate States only admitted on the plea of their having been signatories to the Treaty of Vienna—would never suffice to afford those guarantees for permanence so loudly demanded on all sides. Now, let us ask, is such a majority a thing probable? Is it possible?

Sardinia enters the Congress determined to ask for everything. Austria goes there equally resolved to concede nothing. The Pope accepts the Congress on the express understanding that he is not to be interfered with. His language is, "Do what you will out of the Romagna, but do not assume to dictate to one who derives his title-deeds from a source far higher than yours." The King of Naples is ready to indorse these sentiments. Russia only recognises the Congress as an admirable opportunity to reopen the last Treaty of Paris, and avail herself of her newly-acquired influence at the Tuileries. France desires to replace Austria in the protectorate of Italy—England to rescue Italy from being a province of France.

Now, if a party of gamblers were to seat themselves around a table, one saying, "Our game is 'loo';" another averring it was "commerce;" a third, "vingt-un," and so on, each declaring that at the game of his choice he held the winning card, it would present no inapt illustration of a Congress met to discuss eventualities, animated by desires so opposite, and guarded by instincts so totally unlike. It is truly a Dutch concert, and can scarcely be expected to elicit much harmony.

Of this the Italians are now beginning to be gravely apprehensive. It was in a species of almost unlimited confidence in the thorough-going character of Victor Emmanuel that Italy reposed her fullest trust. Her hope was to have found a man so insensible to peril, and so energetically resolved to "go forward," that all the snares of statecraft and all the wiles of diplomacy would have been powerless against him. The peace of Villafranca gave a rude shock to this faith. It was then seen that the bravest and most impetuous soldier could be totally wanting in another and very different sort of courage. Next came the question of appointing the Prince de Carignan as Regent over Central Italy; and Italians, for the second time, discovered that such was the ascendancy of the French Emperor over the "galant uomo" that every consideration of personal feeling, and every instinct of patriotism in him, gave way before a submissive fear of France.

Is it, then, to be wondered at if the projected annexation to Piedmont is now less ardently desired than at first? The keystone of that policy was faith in the King. Rashness and indiscretion would not have cost him one half the unpopularity that his caution and reserve have done. If, as some assert and proclaim, it was part of the Napoleon policy thus to disparage and discredit the character of Victor Emmanuel, unquestionably a more Machiavellian stroke was never aimed. It was the personal character of the King, his chivalrous daring, his bold, soldierlike frankness, which gave the strongest guarantee for what the object of the war would be; and all were ready to believe it was less the cause of Piedmont than of Italy that was on the issue. The French Emperor has destroyed this faith, and in its destruction has proclaimed that it is to him, and him alone, Italians must look for any benefits to their country. Disbelieve and distrust him as they may, they have yet come to acknowledge that he is the arbiter of their present and (more than probably) will be the dispenser of their future fate. Amongst the many advantages of the secrecy and mystery which have ever surrounded the Imperial policy, one consummate benefit has been that every party in turn have assumed Louis Napoleon to be the head of their peculiar sect, and thus the Ultramontanists, the Moderates, and even the Mazzinists claim him at times as their own. As no one can know what he will do, the field is completely open to Hope. To assert, as some do, that the Emperor can have no desire for this, or no motive for that, is simply to declare an acquaintance with the speculations of one who never reveals to his nearest friend an item of his intentions, and thus there are no more idle guesses than those as to why the Emperor now desires a restoration in the Duchies, the real question being, does he desire it at all? or is the assertion of the wish only a blind to some far deeper and more recondite policy.

One very sad and discouraging truth stands prominently forward through all, which is, that in the settlement of Italy the Italians themselves are playing the most subordinate part, and that, while Spaniards and even Swedes are to be consulted as to their destiny, their own voices are not to be heard nor their own entreaties listened to. Is this fair; is it reasonable; and, what is of almost more consequence for the peace of Europe, is it likely to be lasting?

P.S. The telegraph has just informed us that two English ladies named Sterling have been arrested at Florence for making some demonstrations in favour of the Archduke Ferdinand. It is impossible to censure too severely such unseemly interference in the question of a foreign people, nor to condemn too heavily the utter absence of womanly delicacy and self-respect which prompt persons to these indiscretions. When one thinks of the four Liverpool letter-writers, and then of these ladies, a strong impression will ensue that, of all the nations of Europe, ours is the one most constantly disparaged by the misconduct of her own people, and most frequently exposed to shame by this selfish obtrusiveness and folly.

THE PATAGONIAN OR SOUTH AMERICAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

MY attention has been directed to an article in your impression of Saturday last, in which you betray a very strong antipathy to the above society. Had you limited your remarks to mere principles I should not have troubled you with any comments of my own. But you have—unconsciously I believe—run into such fundamental errors of statement that I must claim space in your Journal to correct them.

First of all, let me assure you that the Patagonian Mission, so far from having come to a "natural though ignominious end," is still in full activity; has never for a moment discontinued its efforts since the Allan Gardiner sailed in 1854; and that its self-denying missionaries are assiduously engaged in learning the language of the Fuegians.

Secondly, let me assure you the plan of the Falkland station has answered; that we have natives from Terra del Fuego under regular instruction there; that the improvement in these natives is something remarkable; that they are gradually receiving and show themselves amenable to Christian principles; that they are fond of writing, in which they give proofs of future excellence; that they are very musical; and that they take to gardening and carpentry with evident zest. In their conduct they are gentle, and show much good feeling.

Thirdly, let me assure you that Captain Snow was received in a very friendly way by the natives during his extremely short visit amongst them; that, although he never asked Jemmy Button to accompany him to the Falklands, yet, when asked on a later occasion to come to the station, he most willingly did so, and brought with him his wife and three children. And, in fact, Sir, the natives are friendly, docile, intelligent, and capable of great improvement, morally and physically. Our desire is to see in them a change spiritually.

But you say, what about the "alien ordinance"? Why, Sir, it is all nonsense. I believe there is a fine if people let their chimneys catch fire, yet people don't scruple to use their chimneys. I believe there is a penalty if a man treats his servants badly, and lets them starve, even in England; yet most of us have very little scruple in engaging servants. There is also in the Falklands a penalty for any one who brings aliens to the islands and leaves them to starve. But, Sir, not having any intention of committing such a crime as this, we do not fear the Alien Act. It has never stood in our way. It is a fabrication, all that about the society not making itself acquainted with the Falkland regulations. Why, one of the members of the committee of the society knew all about, and took part in passing, this very terrible "Alien Act."

But now, Sir, let me explain matters. A former master of our mission vessel, whose temperament must be his excuse, got into collision with everybody in the mission, and everybody in the Falklands, with very rare exceptions. Having attempted to take the mission vessel away from her work contrary to express orders, and having put the society to great expense and inconvenience abroad, he was dismissed from his position. He appealed to a court of law for damages, and you know the verdict.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant, WAITE H. STIRLING, B.A., Sec.
Patagonian Missionary Society, 6, Westbourne-place, Clifton, Dec. 21.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY AT PARIS.

THE Jour de l'An at Paris is a social institution, and, like some of its political relations, has its admirers and its detractors. We will not seek to bias the inclination of our readers as to which category they will join, but prefer leaving them to the exercise of their free judgment in the matter after having duly studied the Illustration from the pencil of our able French artist, M. Beaucé, in our present Number, which we will endeavour to explain by a few observations on the different details of his drawing.

The first day of the New Year is the climax or centrepoint of the forthright preceding and the fortnight following the 1st of January. What Christmas Day is in the midst of the Chaplet, that festive and good wish expressing point of view, is the Jour de l'An with our more vivacious, though perhaps not more worthy folk, neighbours, who do not so generally celebrate their great festival in the family banquets that form the principal feature of our rejoicings, but make them to consist chiefly in a flying visit of which all can exchange sweetmeats, and a present are the usual characteristics. For a long time beforehand the preparations for the giving and receiving ceremonials are entered upon, and it is rarely that the pleasant business is got through before two or three weeks after the inauguration of the New Year.

With the progress of luxury and large fortunes the first day of the New Year has become the occasion of a regular display of large pecuniary means, indicated by the importance of the gift; and the example has spread to such an extent that many persons enjoying but modest revenues spend three months' income in vain appearances, or rather to keep up false ones. What would John Bull say to an income tax of three days' pay in the year? And yet this impost, offered at the shrine of Pride, is paid—more or less willingly. It is true, but always with an air of willingness—by the higher class of Parisians. There are houses in which the gifts of all sorts are exhibited, and woe be to a late arrival whose offering should not be up to the mark with the rest! A card with a few friendly letters or, indeed, he generally does—make some excuse, retire for a short time, pay a visit to the nearest marchand au rez-de-chaussée, and return with a cadeau worthy of taking a place by the side of its precursors. As a general rule the presents are of such weight in the matter of the gifts offered, as distances have occasioned, or which previous intimacies have been hired for the occasion, in order to inspire a just notion of what will be expected from the devotion of the recipients. This is, of course, the vanity side of the gift-offerings. There are many salons in which all are equally welcome; and in the middle and humbler classes the exchange of presents and good wishes is made on the most part, with frankness and sincerity.

In order to give opportunities for an ample provision of presents to suit all purses, not only do the principal shops make an extra display towards the end of the old year, but permission is given for a fortnight to a considerable number of little merchants to erect stalls in the greatest thoroughfares. The great boulevards, from the Madeleine to the Bastille, are thus converted into a double line of tastefully-arranged bazaars, in which those pretty articles for which Paris is so celebrated abound. At the days when the crowds of purchasers becomes more and more dense; and if the weather prove favourable, as it has done this year, these brief speculations turn out advantageously. The pilgrims to the boulevards generally return from them with a load of toys and sweetmeats destined for speedy distribution; Pouches or Polichinelles projecting from their pockets, drums hang conjointly from their waists, and the pipe passed through the Needles is not more critical than the safe arrival of their acquisitions at the bosom of the paternal home. The "Cour de Rois Mages" is a little section of the Boulevard des Italiens, at this time, as in all others, one of the most frequented.

"The Salutations" of the Jour de l'An, though certainly the least courtly, are not always the least pleasant of its observances. The privilege of embracing all one's acquaintances, whether male or female, young or old, implies also the counterpart, that of being embraced by them in return. It has also led to the enjoyment of a disagreeable souvenir, we might be disposed to believe that on New-Year's Day the whole population of Paris is united in the bonds of the most sincere affection, so general is the interchange of sympathy. Everybody embraces everybody with whom he has the slightest friendly acquaintance, and, although the performance may not ultimately be somewhat agreeable, there are occasions in which it would rather be avoided. But, as kissing is a matter of taste and custom, there is a sufficient facial latitude allowed for the accommodation of such as do not wish to profit too nearly of their privileges; in such cases a nidding or bob of the head to a friend on the New Year's Day without lip or cheek contact, takes the place of a more ardent demonstration of affection.

There is a pretty custom, however, in families on New-Year's Day, which consists in the mutual felicitations of "pater and mater familias" by the little denizens of the nursery, who bring their offering of homage to the sleeping-room of their parents to wish them a happy new year. Volumes of numerous gifts of toys and sweetmeats no doubt present the youthful urchins from sleeping their ordinary sleep, and thus enable them to attend the parental levee in spite of the usual claims of Morpheus.

A great number of minor receptions and felicitations are held and offered on the 1st of the new year, in order to give certain persons the opportunity of attending the most important ceremony of the day, which takes place at the Imperial Palace, and is represented in our Engraving as "Reception at the Tuileries," at which the Emperor, surrounded by all the great dignitaries of the empire, "receives" the complimentary wishes of the ambassadors, the ministers, the Marshals of France, &c. The same ceremony se petite throughout by the different Ministers, who "receive" their employés; by the large merchants and manufacturers, who "receive" their workmen and servants, who expect to "receive" in return the same attention, or devoirs, as they have had to pay on New-Year's gift. So much receiving and visiting in there that it is impossible to accomplish it all in one day, so much so that on the preparations beforehand, and the prolongation of the visits, the ceremonies attendant upon each new year make a large hole in a month and a still larger one in the annual revenue of those who are honoured by a goodly circle of friends.

The custom of the gift to grown-up persons, which vary with the means of the giver and the position of the recipient, the étrennes to the shop-people's friends render an expensive visit to the "toyshop" and to the "connoisseurs" indispensable. Every shopkeeper must palaces in Paris have at all times been celebrated, and at this period of the year are inundated with offers of service, so much so that on New-Year's Eve they are difficult of access, and generally keep open all night. Even the toyshops are in a similar state of siege; and the customers vie with each other in the acquisition of the most costly objects submitted to their choice in some of the greatest establishments in the world as that of M. Giroux, for instance, mentioned in our Illustration, where not only toys of the most elegant description, but articles for gifts of an exquisite taste, form an exhibition of the most attractive description.

To the offerings above alluded to, which are generally speaking, looked upon as marks of reciprocal friendship, are added those which are rather regarded in the light of claims satisfied, such as the étrennes to your concierge, or male or female "porter," who, as the pleasing day approaches, conveys your messages or hands you your letters with an interested obsequiousness, which will not even disappear after the 1st of January, in the "Concierge," if you have the privilege of belonging to the National Guard, who proceeds to the porter's lodge, to the gurgons of the different establishments you may honour with your presence, and to their assistants et cætera. Every excuse is sought for the purpose of paying the compliment of the season, which is the forerunner of the gift, and distributed by them at half-letter price—sometimes, in consequence of the incumbrance of the bureaux, a few days after date, like the arrival of the fat Devonshire goose in London intended for Christmas Day, but not delivered till some indefinite subsequent period. Fortunately, compliments on cards will keep, a quality that cannot always be predicated of the much-coveted bird.

We have thus glanced hurriedly at a few of the customs of the New Year in Paris of 1860; we have not attempted to edify our readers with an account of their origin, which, although in some cases curious, would have occupied too much of our space. We rejoice that the New Year has opened in France, and in Europe, with peaceful prospects; and we hope that when the next celebration of the festival comes round it will find that even the few clouds that at present darken the political horizon have been entirely dissipated by the satisfactory settlement of European affairs in progress, and of the Italian question in particular. If the Congress accomplish this, it will have indeed to be regarded as the precious New-Year's Gift of 1860.

TWELFTH NIGHT AT OLYMPUS.

BY ROBERT B. BROUGH AND WILLIAM M'CONNELL.

MERCURY (ALIAS THE ARTFUL DODGER).

Vell! now I call this reether prime; returned from transportation,
As Telegraph Bell's Messenger, I finds a hoccupation.
I'm fond of telling crammers—as the patron of reciters—
Prigs, players, and (especially) the class of comic writers.
I like to rig the market, don't object to giving shocks,
These nimble heels of mine are long familiar with the Stocks.
You ask me, to Society, how I've repassed the wicket?
I speak by card, and (by your Leave) inform you that's the Ticket.

QUEEN JUNO.

In poems, meant for reading or performance histrionical,
They call me "Ox-eyed Juno!"—the Oxide must be iron-ical—
In envy of the goddess who the Trojans' fate could settle,
Sure, Troy weight were the test for one of my superior mettle!
I ne'er but once was beaten—in an action brought by Venus,
Who bribed the Judge (one Paris), a proceeding truly heinous;
If any doubt my verdict let them Virgil's book commence,
Which proves her son accomplice in the Æneas offence!

KING JUPITER.

'M Jove, of high Olympus King, and sitting magistrate,
An Eagle Beak of keener stamp than those you've known of late.
I hurled young Phœbus from the skies, which shows I don't at all
Approve of tumbling beggars, like your Bow street Mr. Hall,
For mere contempt of Court, like weeds and dockleaves in a garden,
By burning pretty Semele I proved myself no Carden;
While as for your Sir Peter, who with wit the Guildhall brightens,
He only puts loose people down, but I put down the Titans.

VULCAN.

Now, here's a job! for one who's forged the bolts of Jove at Etna!
I wish my mate, who welds the chains for Hymen up at Gretna,
Before he joins another link, would look on this invention,
On which I should extremely like to rivet his attention.
At first my missis used to sew my buttons and my strings on;
The rule is now reversed—I'm forced to hammer all her things on!
With this queer skeleton of rings in which she makes me hoop her,
I'm blest if I don't feel myself a sort of Astley Cooper.

VENUS, RISING FROM THE SEA.

May I beg of all observers, if 'tis not too much to hope,
To absolve me from the ordeal of the seaside telescope?
For even Beauty's goddess—Cupid's mother—does not care
To be seen "from Ocean rising" till she's dressed and "done her hair."
If a person should offend (observe, I don't say "gentleman"),
I shall really be compelled to try my friend Diana's plan,
And make him seem the brute he is; in confidence, between us,
He will not be the first calf that's been sacrificed to wean us.

BACCHUS.

What! shut the drinking-fountains up in winter? I complain
Of a law that cuts my liquor off—(it must be from the Maine).
'Twas bad enough to make me sign the pledge, and grog leave off,
At the cruel instigations of a Cruikshank and a Gough;
But an Act that leaves me powerless to quench my deathless thirst
Restores me to the principles I've always thought the first.
I to the "Public" will appeal—(I see there's one next door)—
And crook my shanks as formerly—my motto "Gough no more!"

SATURN, THE CLOCK-DOCTOR.

You've heard about the Good Old Times?—the Oldest Time am I;
To prove that Times were e'er so bad historians I defy.
"Hard Times" forsooth! in that respect, 'tis I can play the Dickens;
As sure as eggs are eggs, Old Time will eat you all, my chickens!
Of ev'ry brood that's hatched to me, the members, off I clear 'em,
And only bring them up to prove my name of Edax rear 'em.
I'm hungry as in Egypt's days, when my paternal swallow
Demanded Rameses served up and ordered "Cheops to follow."

PLUTUS.

Now, if you want a little bill or small acceptance done,
I'm ready to do anything—(pray don't say any one,
The joke is old)—in reason. If it isn't met when due,
You don't suppose I'd scruple the engagement to renew
For next to nothing. Just a fee (a trifle, not to pain us)
To Mercury, my lawyer, and my sponging-house-man, Janus;
With a sop or so to Cerberus, his memory to jog—
A friend of mine, but still "a most unconscionable dog"!

GANYMEDE.

I'm Ganymede, the cup-bearer: my ball is spinning—watch it.
A paradox, for, if I miss, I certainly shall catch it.
Engaged at high Olympus, at the festive board to wait,
The habit there of changing knives and sending round the plate,
Suggested (when I'd lost my place and had to seek a fresh one)
A natural transition to the acrobat's profession.
What! only twopence in the hat! I call that a disheart'ner;
But never mind, a penny more, and then up goes—my partner.

MINERVA.

I'm Jove's own child—a wise one—since my father well I know,
And pronounce him, as a law-giver, insufferably slow.
He disbelieves in Woman's Rights, whate'er her rank or station,
Refusing us the shortest step towards emancipation.
But, never mind! I'm Wisdom's self, and forward, with enjoyment,
I look towards the time when we shall all obtain employment.
Meanwhile, of man's hostility, the snake to kill or "scotch,"
Like our champion, Mr. Bennett, let us all be on the watch.

DIANA.

I have a private fortune with my hunting-lodge and grounds;
The puppies may come after me, but I'll pursue the hounds.
No suitor will annoy me, if possessed of any sense,
For a huntress of my spirit is the one to take a-fence.
Just ask my luckless neighbour, poor Actæon, who, t' other day,
Through my preserves, attempted to establish right of way.
I hunted him, quite legally, to death, through every Court,
And sent him to the dogs for interfering with my sport.

MARS.

Halt! Shoulder, hup! Attention! I should like to stand at ease;
But I'm really unaccustomed to habiliments like these.
Remember, I'm a veteran, who forts and cities stormed
Long ages back, before a single Rifleman was formed.
No matter! I'm in favour of the voluntary movement
(For who shall say old soldiers are the foemen of improvement?)
But still—Colts, Enfields, Lancasters, however fashion dubs
New weapons—don't neglect the ancient principle of Clubs!

MOMUS (IN DECADENCE).

The jester's calling so abused of late has been, alas!
That I my old suggestion of inserting panes of glass
In human hearts, am forced to try, to gain a livelihood.
Just let me stick a pane in yours—'twould serve me if you would.
You'd rather not? I understand: the laughing glazier's art
Was merely planned to ascertain if man has got a heart
That, naked to the public gaze, he fears not to discover.
In these cold times, I see, you like the window frosted over.

APOLLO.

By Jove's indignant thunder, sent from high Olympus rolling,
On nether earth I pine and whine, a player poor and strolling.
I'm out of an engagement now—I had a good one once,
But lost it through the judgment of a criticising dunce,
One Midas (be his name abhorred in the remotest climes),
The man who "did the music" for the columns of those Times.
He cut me up; I served him out with punishment severe,
Which proved, whate'er his music taste, at least, he'd lots of ear.

NEPTUNE, "OUR FINE OLD ADMIRAL."

How gallantly, how merrily, we ride along the sea!
Though steam and screw-propellers are inventions new to me.
No end of my old notions are "smashed into a cocked hat":
I don't approve of all the care they've used to kill "the cat."
Nor do I altogether like—in candour I confess—
This modern interference with the freedom of the press:
Yet, spite old age, new views, and gout, on deck I keep my feet,
And think the ocean can't be slow while we've the Channel Fleet.

PAN, THE PIPER.

I'm piping Pan, who through the woods, a merry laughing wag, pipes,
A wand'ring minstrel, playing on a kind of a Jem-Bagg-pipes;
My sweetheart to a reed they turned, by some queer incantation,
To mock me, I suppose—a Pan-to-mimic transformation.
That I was terribly cut up by this you may infer,
But then I thought the better plan would be to cut up her.
I turned her into playing pipes, a world-renown to gain, meant,
As author of "Reed's musical and comic entertainment."

PLUTO.

I'm hupper servant here, and lord hof the hinferior regions;
There ain't a dirty scullion imp but howes to me hallegiance.
The 'ouse-dog, Cerberus, with me, is playful as a cat,
And the sulky boatman, Charon, 'ave to me to doff his hat.
I'm dignified, but haffable, save when mis-chie-vous chaps,
Like Hercules and Theseus comes, with run-away door-raps,
Or wand'ring minstrels in the street disturb our 'ousehold peace * * *
There's that there Horpheus again—now, where is the perlice?

HEBE.

I'm Hebe—of Olympian belles, the loveliest, by far, made,
Though filling but the humble situation of a barmaid.
Be pleased to give your orders, and get rid of me forthwith,
As I have to give a sitting to the famous Mr. Frith.
(I believe he's not a Scotchman, since you ask, nor from the North,
For a Frith of first-rate talent can't be near the Frith of Forth),
He's to paint me in a picture: "Nectar, sir?"—'tis to be styled.
With regard to the expression—I should say he'd draw it mild.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

HUMBOLDT FOUNDATION.—General Sabine has consented to act as treasurer for Britain, and will receive subscriptions at his residence, 13, Ashley place, Westminster. Above £600 have been already subscribed.

IRIDIUM.—M. Jacobi has presented to the French Academy an ingot of this exceedingly rare metal, weighing 267 grammes (about 8¾oz. avoirdupois). Iridium was discovered in the ore of platinum by Tennant in 1804. M. Jacobi also presented several beautiful medals composed of various alloys of iridium and platinum, which were greatly admired.

A NEW GAS.—The eminent chemist, M. Berthelot, has announced to the Société Philomathique at Paris that he has discovered the existence of a new gas, which he terms the "quadricarbure" of hydrogen ($C^4 H^2$). It is produced in the decomposition of alcohol and ether, under the influence of a red temperature. Its properties, much resembling those of olefiant gas, will be described in a memoir.

NEW THERMO-BAROMETER.—This instrument, frequently called a sympiesometer, is very useful, being more sensitive than the mercurial barometer. It is, however, not free from defects. In the new number of the Philosophical Magazine Mr. Thomas Tate points out some defects in the construction of the thermo-barometer, and gives some new forms which he considers would avoid certain difficulties and sources of error. He supports his views by algebraical calculations.

NEW SPIRITOMETER.—M. Jacobi, in the name of his colleague, M. Kupffer, the director of the Central Physical Observatory of Russia, laid before the French Academy of Sciences two specimens of a new spiritometer, one of metal and one of glass. The theory of this apparatus is founded on the tables of Gilpin and Gay Lussac lately verified by Pouillet. The Academy has appointed a committee to examine into the merits of this invention, on which they will report.

THE LATE M. LOUIS POINSOT, member of the French Academy of Science, whose recent obsequies were honoured by the presence of his many distinguished scientific friends, was one of the most eminent geometers of Europe. To the most profound knowledge he united the rare gift of remarkable elegance of expression. He was eighty-one years of age, having been born in 1777. He was educated at the renowned Ecole Polytechnique, and succeeded the great Lagrange in a seat in the Academy. His work, "Eléments de Statique," is much admired. He was the oldest member of the Academy except Biot, the friend and pupil of Laplace.

THE DIATOMACEÆ (a group of organised beings with which we have now become intimately acquainted by the aid of the excellent microscopes now constructed) forms the subject of the principal paper (by Dr. G. C. Wallich) in the new number of the Annals of Natural History. It consists of "Observations on the Distribution and Habits of the Pelagic (or Marine) and Fresh-water, Free-floating Diatomaceæ," in which are discussed the range of depth in which these organisms (which some naturalists consider to be animals, others vegetables) are found the conditions under which their siliceous remains are deposited, and form vast sedimentary strata; and, lastly, the extent and nature of their locomotive powers.

ARTIFICIAL MARBLE.—With respect to the notice of Signor Fioravanti's invention of giving plaster the appearance of marble (in our Number for Dec. 3), we have received a letter from Signor P. Montalti, banker, at Turin, stating that Signor Fioravanti, after twenty years' experiments, has succeeded in successfully imitating not only Carrara but also all other marbles, and that he possesses five hundred patterns on exhibition. Signor Montalti states further that he is authorised to sell the patent for England—the basis of the contract to be that, previously, pieces of plaster, marked for identification, be sent to Italy, to be returned after a few days changed in appearance to any quality of marble, lapis lazuli, giallo antico, malachite, agate, &c.

A NEW ACTINOMETER (an instrument for measuring the intensity of the sun's rays) is figured and described by Dr. Thomas Woods in the last number of the Philosophical Magazine. A short, square phial, holding about two ounces, is filled with a solution of peroxalate of iron. Through the cork a glass tube (open at both ends) is passed into the liquid in the bottle—both cork and tube fitting airtight in their places—and a graduated scale is attached to the tube. When light is applied to the solution, carbonic acid gas is evolved, which causes the liquid to rise in the tube. The scale shows the amount of action going on. Precaution must be taken to avoid sudden change of temperature. Dr. Wood, in an addendum to his paper, says that he has made experiments with his actinometer and found it completely to answer his expectations.

A NEW METHOD OF BLEACHING the pulp in paper-making has been devised by MM. Firmin Didot. The operation consists in causing carbonic acid gas to be employed to increase the energy of the bleaching action. While the chloride of lime is in contact with the fibre to be bleached a current of carbonic acid, proceeding from the combustion of charcoal, is introduced in a highly divided state into the midst of the liquid. The gas unites with the lime, and the hypochlorous acid, being set at liberty, acts much more energetically as a decoloriser than the hypochlorite. This process is of such extreme simplicity that wonder has been excited that it was not invented sooner. A description of the apparatus, with a woodcut, appears in the Répertoire de Chimie.

NESTS OF FISHES.—M. Valenciennes has placed under the eyes of the French Academy two nests found at a great depth beneath the surface of the sea, which he thinks must be formed by fishes, although he cannot determine the species which has constructed them. These nests resemble those of birds, except in being formed entirely of objects found only at the bottom of the ocean, such as remains of polypes, mussels, &c. This is a new fact in favour of the nidification of certain fishes, an opinion held by Aristotle, Pliny, and other eminent naturalists, but rejected by the moderns for want of proof. These nests were found, during the cod fishery off the coast of Newfoundland, in lat. 44° N. and 60° W., by a Captain Blouet, who has given them to the Museum of Natural History.

PROFESSOR FARADAY'S CHRISTMAS LECTURES.—This course began on Saturday last (instead of the Tuesday preceding, when the Professor was incapacitated from lecturing by loss of voice through cold). Happily the hoarseness manifested in Mr. Faraday's voice at the beginning disappeared as he proceeded, much to the gratification of the sympathising audience with which the theatre was crammed. The character and distinction of the forces manifested in all the phenomena of animate and inanimate nature were lucidly stated and exhibited—viz., the forces of gravitation, of heat, the chemical and electric forces, &c. The force of gravitation (or attraction) was the subject of the first lecture. By it the motions of the heavenly bodies are regulated. Its identity with weight was shown, and its action on the threefold condition of all matter, solids, liquids, and gases (as ice, water, and steam), demonstrated by experiments. Much interest was excited by the manufacture, pouring out, and weighing of carbonic acid gas. The centre of gravity was explained and illustrated in a most amusing manner. The guinea and feather experiment (showing that all bodies fall to the ground with equal velocity when the resisting air is excluded) was performed—gold-leaf being substituted for the feather.——Mr. Faraday's second lecture was delivered on Tuesday last, when he had happily so far recovered from illness as to feel justified in announcing his intention to complete his course in the present week, by lecturing every day. The subject of gravitation was concluded by a simple and beautiful illustration of the law of attraction, which acts inversely with the square of the distance. A small screen was moved between a fixed light and a white board. At one-fourth of the distance from the board the shadow of the screen was twice its size when close to the board; at half the distance, four times greater; at three-fourths the distance, nine times greater, and so on. Astronomical calculations in accordance with this law led to the discovery of the planet Neptune. The main subject of the lecture was the "Attraction of Cohesion," the force by which all bodies are held together. The simple aggregation of particles was shown by the action of a magnet on some nails, with which a small arch was constructed. The various degrees and kinds of this force were pointed out, as in the case of the diamond and pure charcoal (otherwise identical). Attention was particularly drawn to the marvellous power exhibited in crystallisation; and its variety, as shown in the different planes of cleavage of mica, calcareous spar, alum, &c. The powerful adhesion of pieces of clean lead pressed together was exhibited. By virtue of this force a bar of iron one inch square will support twenty tons weight. Mr. Faraday swung himself about supported only by a thin iron wire. The lecture concluded with experiments showing how light is affected by passing through certain bodies (mica, calcareous spar, &c.), the rays emitted from Duboscq's beautiful electirc lamp being employed for the purpose.

THE NEW YEAR.—This is a "bissextile" or leap-year, and in next month there will accordingly be twenty-nine days instead of twenty-eight, as usual. There will be four Sundays after the Ephipany (yesterday); Lent will commence on the 22nd of February, and Easter Day will fall on Sunday, the 8th of April—a fortnight earlier than last year. Whit-Sunday will occur on the 27th of May, and Trinity on the 3rd of June. There will be twenty-five Sundays after Trinity; Advent Sunday will recur on the 2nd of December, and Christmas Day will fall on a Tuesday, two days later (owing to leap-year) than last year; that is, according to the solar cycle, when the reckoning is by the days of the week exclusively.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.—A society, of which the declared object is to promote the employment of women in such occupations as are suitable for their sex, and opening up others which have been hitherto closed to them, has been established under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, supported by many gentlemen of philanthropic views and eminent position. An office as a centre of inquiry is to be opened, and it is in contemplation also to form classes for the instruction of woman in book-keeping and other branches of business. Subscriptions to about £350 have been received for carrying out the purposes referred to; but this sum is obviously insufficient for commencing operations on the necessary scale. The excellent objects aimed at by the society fully justify an appeal for further support, and we trust that all who are desirous of seeing the arena of female employment usefully extended will come forward to render that assistance which is so much needed, and which a society established under such auspices has a fair ground to anticipate.

THE TOY-SHOP: NEW-YEAR'S GIFTS.

JUST because he is Fogey! That is my final decision, my summing up of him and his case, and further argument is perfectly unnecessary. Were he not a Fogey he could never have expressed such an opinion, and so there is an end of the matter. Unless——

I will ask the reader—Reader, I have been endeavouring to convince old Croaker that the New-Year is a kindly season—that it is a pleasant sight to see folks merry-making—that to look on for an hour at a child's New-Year's party, to watch the little creatures romp and play, to hearken to the sweet music of their ringing laughter, to lose, for the time, beneath the magical influence of their light-heartedness, the recollection of the cares and strifes of this hard, grinding, work-a-day world, must have a beneficial and humanising effect even upon such an incorrigible old misanthrope as Croaker. To which powerful appeal, garnished with a few of those flowers of rhetoric I, as occasion may require, cull at pleasure from my private conservatory, Croaker, at once sarcastic and laconic, replied, "Pooh!"

Even this line of argument, if argument it can be called, is not original. However, it is popular; it is easy and unanswerable; it is a capital line to take with hot-headed or enthusiastic persons; it is the impenetrable fortress behind which Paterfamilias shelters himself against the attacks of an injured or indignant family. There is mamma, who says that a party is an absolute necessity; that, much as she dreads the trouble and expense, it really cannot be avoided; there are Jack's pegtops and Georgiana's crinoline, which must be worn because they are the proper things to wear, and everybody wears them; there is Bob, who knows a fellow in a lower form, of half his age, who has wellington boots and a watch, so he must have them, too. To all which Paterfamilias says simply "Pooh!" And he could not do better; that "pooh" is worth a lifetime's argument, and is a deal more convincing.

You know Croaker! By the way, do you know Croaker? If not, I will introduce him.

Up Deadman's-yard are Goblin Chambers, the gloomiest and most inconvenient set in London. The rooms are so small, so dark, so musty-smelling and uncomfortable that most of them are generally "to let." At present the only occupants of this dreary building are myself and Croaker. We are old residents. I have been here for twenty years: there is no knowing when Croaker came. The laundress, before the present one, found him living here: it is, perhaps, his birthplace. He has no relations who visit him. There is a legend in the yard which says that once upon a time a great parish authority, yclept the Beadle, called upon him concerning the maintenance of an aged female relative, and it goes on to say that this was Croaker's mother. I hardly know whether or not I should believe it. Croaker, in a moment of confidence, informed me that his family had always been a burden to him; since he was a boy he had supported them. According to his own account they must have been dependent upon him shortly after he was weaned.

There is another tradition in the yard of the visit of a certain old lady, spare in body, dingy in attire, who called at the inn, and inquired for Croaker in a pitifully whining tone. Mrs. M'Paring, our laundress—a most estimable woman, whose only weakness lies in the black bottles in the tenants' cupboards—overheard a portion of the conversation (accidentally) through the keyhole. She heard the strange visitor say she was starving, and heard Croaker tell her that she ought to be ashamed of herself for being so. He then bade her begone; and the old lady, coming pale and trembling from his presence, huddled herself in a dark corner of the staircase and whimpered there for hours, until, I believe, she was, by the intervention of an intelligent member of the Z division, moved on to the next parish. Was this his mother?

Croaker is said to be very rich. When he is found dead in his bed some morning at breakfast-time by the worthy M'Paring, there will,

A BRITISH REMEDY FOR A BRITISH MALADY.
DR. TWEEDALE'S HOP PILLS (containing the quintessence of the finest hops) have proved to be the greatest discovery of the age, as a perfect annihilator of the monster INDIGESTION,
That torment of our brightest days,
And horror of our nights.
Their action on the human system is gradually and mildly to expel from it all undigested accumulations and impurities; and then, when taken freely, so to saturate it with the antiseptic and tonic properties peculiar to the hop plant as to astonish the patient by his immunity from his old enemy.
These pills are supplied to the public (through agents only) by the proprietor, Mr. F. A. RICHARDSON, Long Ditton, Surrey, in boxes, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each; and may be had of all dealers in patent medicines.
LONDON AGENTS.

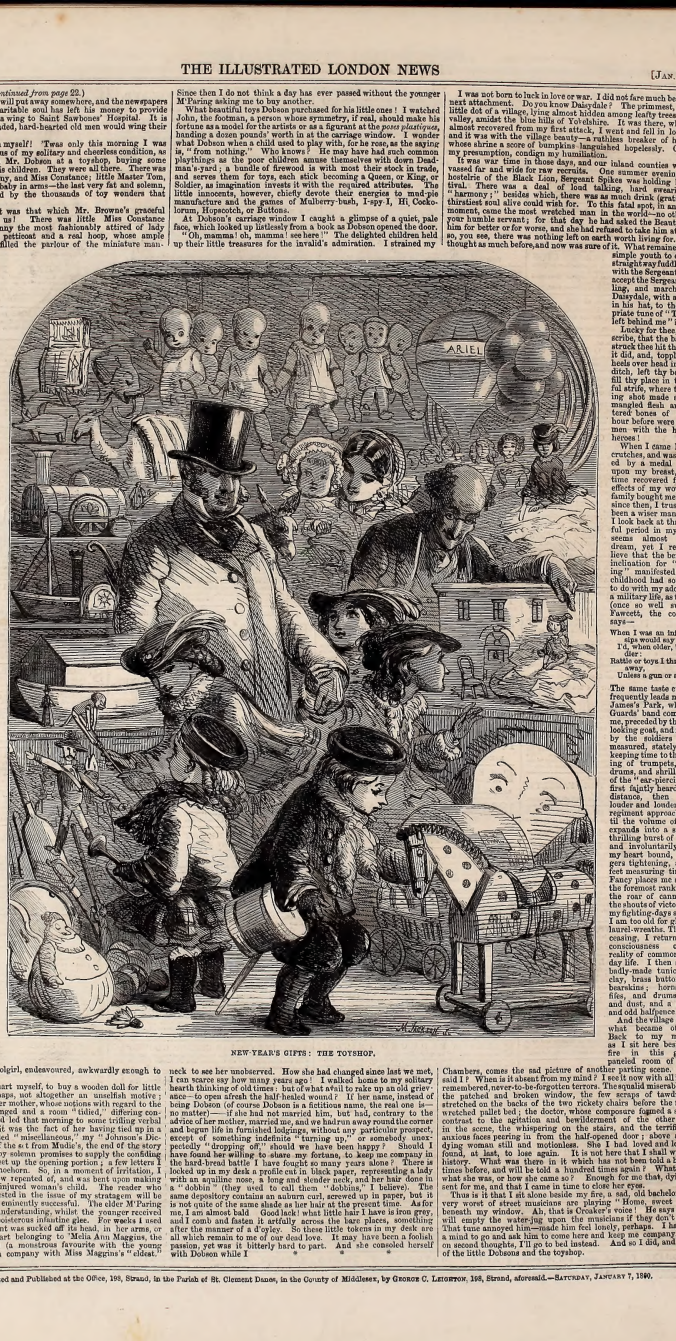
no doubt, be discovered a will put away somewhere, and the newspapers will announce that the charitable soul has left his money to provide for the erection of an extra wing to Saint Sawbones' Hospital. It is thus that these wrong-headed, hard-hearted old men would wing their way heavenwards.

Alas, I am a lonely man myself! 'Twas only this morning I was more than usually conscious of my solitary and cheerless condition, as I chanced to light upon Mr. Dobson at a toyshop, buying some New-Year's presents for his children. They were all there. There was Miss Annie, and Miss Fanny, and Miss Constance; little Master Tom, and Master Archy, and a baby in arms—the last very fat and solemn, and not at all astonished by the thousands of toy wonders that surrounded him.

What a pretty sight it was that which Mr. Browne's graceful pencil has watched for us! There was little Miss Constance pointing out to Miss Fanny the most fashionably attired of lady dolls in a most embroidered petticoat and a real hoop, whose ample skirts would quite have filled the parlour of the miniature mansion she sat in front of. There was Miss Annie exhibiting to Master Archy the acrobatic capabilities of a monkey with the stiffest and most unwaggable of tails, whose aimless life is spent in tumbling halfway over the top of a pole, and, being pulled back, to tumble over again; while Tom was picking out the points of a red-spotted Arabian with quite the air of a connoisseur in cockhorse flesh. There was the cackling old toyman, who himself would have made no bad design for a jumping jack, extolling the merits of his wares, dwelling, you may be sure, upon the superior attractions of the most expensive, such as the great talking doll that said "Mamma" nearly as plainly as a talking fish; or the Noah's ark, in which, on opening the lid, you found Noah and his family and the zoological collection all upside down, and so tightly packed that you could not help congratulating yourself that you were not a passenger in the same boat.



To all that was passing Dobson listened with as solemn a face as his young set born, for he is, I should fancy, as unimaginative a man as say on 'Change, and only bade the toyman show the children something that "would not break," which is much the same as giving a child a lollipop, and telling him it must not be eaten. It was a strange sight, too, to see the wealthy stockbroker in this stronghold of gimcracks. I had not thought him half so kind a father. I should have imagined that he valued these pretty little children and their mamma as he valued his fine house and the rest of its furniture—not more. I had known him but as a stern, exacting taskmaster, a punctual nevertailing man of business, at whose command the old clerks bowed their shrivell gates in all humility, and trembled in their shoes. Yet there he stood, approving or disapproving, in turns, of the proposed purchases. All around goggle-eyed, copper-coloured dolls contorted vacantly at him, makes wagged their heads at him, and an impudent roly-poly Mussulman winked at him as though he were only a commonplace person instead of being Dobson, of Dobson and Jobson's, Threadneedle-street, London; Castle-street, Liverpool; Rue Vivienne, Paris; the Corso di Porta Vercellina, Milan; and the Gostinodoor, St. Petersburg. It was at the moment that he was most touching, considering the antics of a penny jack, and pulling the string that, flailing up, he caught my eye, and the City gentleman, blushing like a schoolgirl, endeavoured, awkwardly enough to hide the toy behind him.

I had grown, I fear, quite mart myself, to buy a wooden doll for little Miss M'Paring, with, perhaps, not altogether an unselfish motive; for I wished to commend her mother, whose notions with regard to the way papers should be arranged and a room "tidied," differing considerably from my own, had led that morning to some trifling verbal unpleasantness between us. It was the fact of her having tied up in a brown paper parcel, labelled "miscellaneous," my "Johnson's Dictionary," which I had left on the s:t from Mudie's, the end of the story with which I was bound by solemn promises to supply the confiding printer, who had already set up the opening portion; a few letters I wanted to see, and a few others. So, in a moment of irritation, I had called her names I now repented of, and was bent upon making this peace-offering to the injured woman's child. The reader who may happen to feel interested in the issue of my stratagem will be pleased to hear that it was eminently successful. The elder M'Paring quite forgot our little misunderstanding, whilst the younger received my New-Year's gift with boisterous infantine glee. For weeks I used to see it, hung after the paint was sucked off its head, in her arms, or taking an airing in a geeart belonging to Media Ann Maggins, the sweetstuff-shop little girl (a monstrous favourite with the young population of our yard), in company with Miss Maggins's "eldest," since then I do not think a day has ever passed without the younger M'Paring asking me to buy another.

What beautiful toys Dobson purchased for his little ones! I watched John, the footman, a person whose symmetry, if real, should make his fortune as a model for the artists or as a figurant at the poses plastiques, handing a dozen pounds' worth in at the carriage window. I wonder what Dobson when a child used to play with, for he rose, as the saying is, "from nothing." Who knows? He may have had such common playthings as the poor children amuse themselves with down Deadman's-yard; a bundle of firewood is with most their stock in trade, and serves them for bows, and arrows, stick cavalry, a Queen, or Lady Soldier, as imagination invests it with the required attributes. The little innocents, however, chiefly devote their energies to mud-pie manufacture and the games of Mulberry-bush, I-spy I, Hi, Cockolorum, Hopscotch, or Buttons.

At Dobson's carriage window I caught a glimpse of a quiet, pale face, which looked up listlessly from a book as Dobson opened the door.

"Oh, mamma! oh, mamma! see here!" The delighted children held up their little treasures for the invalid's admiration. I strained my neck to see her unobserved. How she had changed since last we met, I can scarce say how many years ago.

I walked home to my solitary hearth thinking of old times: but of what avail to rake up an old grievance—to open afresh the half healed wound? If her name, instead of being Dobson (of course Dobson is a fictitious name, the real one is—no matter)—if she had not married him, but had, contrary to the advice of her mother, married me, and we hadrun away round the corner and begun life in furnished lodgings, without any particular prospect, except of something indefinite "turning up," or somebody unexpectedly "dropping off," should we have been happy? Should I have found her willing to share my fortune, to keep me company in the hard-bread battle I have fought so many years alone? There is locked up in my desk a profile cut in black paper, representing a lady with an aquiline nose, a long and slender neck, and her hair done in a "Ringlet" (they used to call them "dobbins," I believe). The same depository contains an auburn curl, screwed up in paper, but it is not quite of the same shade as her hair at the present time. As for me, I am almost bald. Good luck! what little hair I have is iron grey, and I comb and fasten it artfully across the bare places, something after the manner of a d'oyley. So these little tokens in my desk are all which remain to me of our dead love. It may have been a foolish passion, yet was it bitterly hard to part. And she consoled herself with Dobson while I

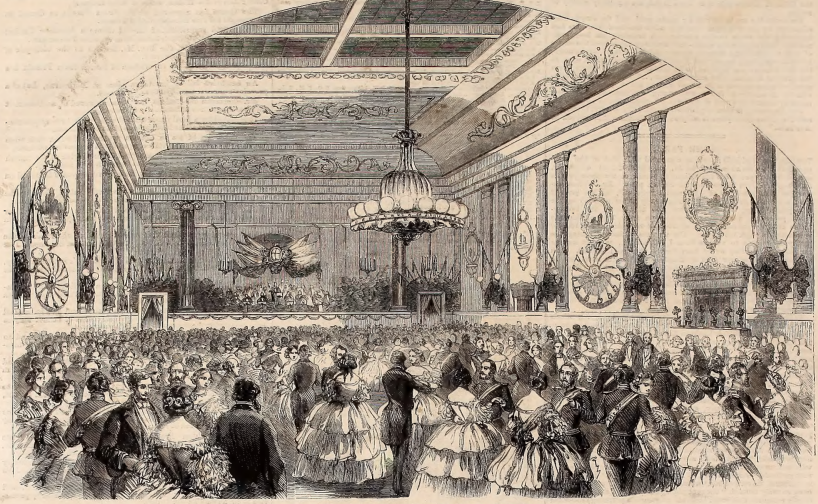
I was not born to luck in love or war. I did not fare much better in my next attachment. Do you know Daisydale? The primmest, prettiest, little dot of a village, lying almost hidden among leafy trees, in a deep valley, amidst the blue hills of Yolesbire. It was there, when I had almost recovered from my first attack, I went and fell in love again, and it was with the village beauty—a ruthless breaker of hearts—at whose shrine a score of bumpkins languished hopelessly. Great was my presumption, condign my humiliation.

It was war time in those days, and our inland counties were canvassed far and wide for raw recruits. One summer evening, in the hostelrie of the Black Lion, Sergeant Spikes was holding high festival. There was a deal of loud talking, hard swearing, and "harmony;" besides which, there was as much drink (gratis) as the thirstiest soul alive could wish for. To this fatal spot, in search, lucky moment, came the most wretched man in the world—no other than your humble servant; for that day in Daisydale was to take him for better or for worse, and she had refused to take him at all, and so, you see, there was nothing left on earth worth living for. He had thought as much before, and now was sure of it.

Lucky for him, humble scribe, that the ball which struck close hit thee where it did, and, toppling thee soon over head into a dry ditch, left thy bettere to fill thy place in the fearful strife, where the searing shot made so much mangled flesh and shattered bones of what an hour before were stalwart men with the hearts of heroes!

When I came home on crutches, and was rewarded by a medal to hang upon my breast, and in time recovered from the effects of my wound, my family bought me out, and since then, I trust, I have been a wiser man. When I look back at that eventful period in my life, it seems almost like a dream, yet I really believe that the bent of an inclination for "soldiering" manifested in my childhood had something to do with my adoption of a military life, as the song (once so well sung by Yarnett, the comedian) says—

When I was an infant gossips would say
I'd, when older, be a soldier:
Rattle or toys I threw them away,
Unless a gun or a sabre.



The same taste even now frequently leads me to St. James's Park, where the Guards' band comes upon me, preceded by the gravelooking goat, and followed by the soldiers with a measured, stately tramp, keeping time to the clenging of trumpets, roll of drums, and shrill sounds of the "ear-piercing fife." first faintly heard in the distance, then waxing louder and louder as the regiment approaches, until the volume of sound expands into a swelling, thrilling burst of melody, and involuntarily I feel my heart bound, my fingers tightening, and my feet measuring time, and Fancy places me arain in the foremost rank amidst the roar of cannon and the shouts of victory. But my fighting-days are over. I am too old for glory and laurel-wreaths. The music ceasing, I return to my consciousness of the reality of common everyday life. I then see only badly-made tunics, pipeclay, brass buttons, and bearskins; horns, and fifes, and drums, noise and dust, and a shilling and odd halfpence a day.

And the Daisydale beauty, what became of her? Back to my memory, as I sit here beside my fire in this gloomy-genteel of Golden Chambers, comes the sad picture of another parting scene. Comes, said I? When is it absent from my mind? It left now with all its well-remembered, never-to-be-forgotten terrors. The squalid snowbesmeared room, the patched and broken window, the few scraps of tawdry rags stretched on the backs of the two rickety chairs before the fire, the wretched pallet bed; the doctor, whose composure formed a striking contrast to the agitation and bewilderment of the female actors in the scene, the whispering on the stairs, and the terrified and anxious faces peering in from the half-opened door; above all, the dying woman still and motionless. She had fainted, and we thought, found, at last, to lose again.

It is not here that I shall write the history. What was there in it which has not been a hundred times before, and will be told a hundred times again? What matter what she was, or how she came so? Enough for me that, dying, she cared for me, and that I cared for her.

Thus is it that I sit alone beside my fire, a sad, old bachelor. The very worst of street musicians are playing "Home, sweet home," beneath my window. Ah, that is Croaker's voice! He says that he will empty the water-jug upon the musicians if they don't depart. That tune annoyed him—made him feel lonely, perhaps. I have half a mind to go and ask him to come here and keep me company. No—on second thoughts, I'll go to bed instead. And so I did, and dreamt of the little Dobsons and the toyshop.

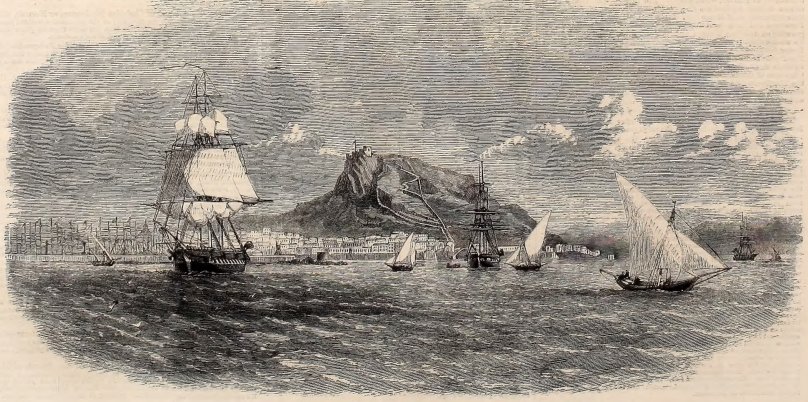
BALL GIVEN BY THE OFFICERS OF THE 9TH LANCERS AT THE ROYAL PUBLIC ROOMS, EXETER.

ALICANTE.

ALICANTE, or Alicant (the Lucentum of the ancients), is a town on the south-east coast of Spain, and is important as being the only Spanish seaport in direct railway communication with the capital. It was consequently chosen as the point of embarkation for the troops en route from Madrid and the interior provinces to join the expedition against Morocco. Alicante was formerly the residence of many English merchants and their families, but their number has of late years considerably diminished. The town is picturesquely situated under a castle-crowned rock, but the immediate environs are arid and unproductive. Alicante is situated in the province of the same name, which was formed, in 1834, of the southern part of the ancient kingdom of Valencia and the small portion of Murcia.

BALL GIVEN AT EXETER BY THE OFFICERS OF THE 9TH LANCERS.



THE officers of the 9th Lancers gave a grand ball at the Royal Public Rooms, Exeter, on Thursday se'nnight, which was attended by about 500 of the leading nobility and gentry of the county. The room was profusely decorated with flowers and evergreens, supplied by Mr. Watson, of Bridge-street, the walls being adorned with lances and swords. At the end of the room, encircled with flowers, were the names of the battles in which the regiment had distinguished itself—namely, Punnuar, Sobraon, Peninsula, Delhi, Chillianwallah, Goojerat, Punjaub, Lucknow, &c. The supper was provided by Mr. Cuthbertson, and comprised every delicacy of the season. The band of the Lancers attended, and dancing was kept up with unabated spirit until morning. The following were among the company present:—The Earl and Countess of Devon, Sir Stafford and Lady Northcote, Sir Edward and Lady Prideaux, Lady Chichester, Lord Garness, Lord and Lady Courtenay, the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay and Lady Courtenay, Sir Massey and Lady Lopes, Lord Clinton, Sir John and Lady Duckworth, and Lady Carew.

PORTLAND, VICTORIA.

THE town of Portland, on the bay of the same name, in the colony of Victoria, is situated in 38 deg. 20 min. S. and 141 deg. 40 min. E., about halfway between Melbourne and Adelaide, being distant from the former 234 and from the latter 300 miles. Although as a township it only dates from 1842, it is the oldest settlement in the colony, having been occupied as a whaling station in 1833; but the influence and enterprise of the Messrs. Henly, who arrived here in 1834, have been mainly instrumental in raising Portland to its present position.

At a distance of twenty miles east stands the Julia Percy Island, about two miles in length from north to south, by one in width, and rising to a height of from two to three hundred feet. It is frequented by seals. At a distance of about four miles from the town and one from the main stand the Lourence Rocks. These give the entrance to the bay a most picturesque appearance. There are two jetties: the old one is 600 feet long, and has a depth of water of eleven feet; the new one, built last year by Messrs. C. and D. Baillie, is a fine structure, most creditable to the contractors, and is 910 feet long, with a depth of water of seventeen feet; so that coasting vessels and steamers come alongside and load or discharge without the risk and expense of transhipment and lighterage. The anchorage is good, with room for a hundred ships, and, with a breakwater to break the force of the sea during storms from the south-east (the only exposed point, and from which there is very seldom a gale), the harbour would be the finest and safest on the coast, and the only one fitted for a harbour of refuge on the whole south coast of Australia. The town rises from the bay on a gentle slope, the streets running east and west and north and south. To the south of the old jetty are the Custom House, Post Office, Telegraph Office, Court House, and Gaol, all substantial stone structures; to the east is the mouth of the fine lagoon, which, bounding the south and part of the west sides of the town, yields an abundant supply of fresh water, and furnishes amusement to sportsmen by the numbers of wildfowl which frequent it. The lofty headland to the north is Whaler's Bluff; the southern one, from which this View was taken, bears a flagstaff for signaling vessels, near to which a lighthouse, thirty-five feet high, has been constructed. The public buildings are generally good, built of hornstone: the English Roman Catholic Churches, with the Union Bank, the Bank of Australasia, and Mac's Hotel, are especially worthy of notice.

The footpaths are being rapidly made good, and the streets macadamised, by the Municipal Council; while the Road Board are fast improving the roads to the interior. A tramway has been commenced—and eight miles made—to Hamilton (sixty miles), the centre of a fine agricultural district, already thickly settled by farmers; but it is confidently hoped that it will be made a railroad at once, as the Government are believed to be favourable to the change, from the extreme lowness of its estimated cost, £2000 per mile, as compared with the expensive lines now making out of Melbourne. The climate is excellent, and a sea-bathing establishment has been recently erected at a cost of £1500. The population is about 4000.

Our Engraving is from a photograph taken by Mr. W. Clapham; and the above description is adopted from Fairfax's "Handbook to Australia."

THE FARM.

THE last Gazette of 1859 shows, as compared with that of the same period of 1858, an advance of 4s. 6d. on wheat, 2s. 4d. on barley, and 1s. 6d. on rye; while the decrease in favour of oats is one penny a bushel. 6d. on oats, 6d. on beans, and 5s. 3d. on peas. Mr. Willich announces that each £100 of the rent charge will, for the present year, amount to £110 17s. 8d., being nearly 2 per cent above the last year's value, which was itself the highest of the twenty-three preceding years. It would appear from the Government tables that the average worth of £100 of rent-charge for 1837-60 is exactly 1s. 8d. below par. The imports of grain during the past year amount to no less than 1,250,000 qrs., and but for the casualties at sea they would have nearly touched 1,300,000. This shows an increase over 1858 of 290,000 qrs.; and it must also be set to the credit side of 1859 that the direct re-export from England was only 90,000 qrs., or 60,000 qrs. less than 1858. When we look back to 1842, which old Smithfield Club judges still fondly recollect as Sir Charles Tempest's "Peach year," and compare it with the era of Bentinck and Disbrowe, we find the blessed importations have very nearly quadrupled themselves.

Farmers are looking out eagerly for a change to drying winds or frost; and more dilettante agriculturists about town are speculative on the contest which looms in the distance for the editorship of the Royal Society's journal. If the race for the sovereign's seat was a complete Derby, the present is quite a St. Leger, and, true to the simile, will have protracted competitors. The Chief-Jane Express avows that "some very good men are known to be in the field, the author of several prize essays on the society, the editor of a contemporary journal, a University man who touches both ends, a smart critic and able speaker being at present among the favourites." Five hundred per annum is a desirable prize; but, as there are only two volumes to bring out yearly, and the society demand the whole of the editor's time, that functionary ought to have a very pleasant time of it, if he is not too much harassed by the adoption of the journal committee.

The breeders of Devons, with the Earl of Leicester at their head, have shown their appreciation of the labours of Captain Davy, who founded their "Herd Book" a few years since, by presenting him with a silver cup and salver. The cup (whose pretty little scale is very general in America, in fact so much so that this "Herd Book" is reprinted there, Mr. Dudhouse's "Herd Book" for which will have been so truly termed "the rent paying Herefords" has reached its fourth volume. This breed lacks the universal advantages accorded to the shorthorns, and is almost entirely supported by its purity by the tenant farmers of Hereford and the adjoining counties. It is generally worthy of notice, in connection with this, that during the past year a tenant farmer, Mr. Price, of Pembridge, whose herd does not contain more than twenty breeding cows, gave 225 gs. for Salisbury, the second in his class at Warwick, and 200 gs. for his winner at Hereford; and that a steer won the gold medal for the best ox bred in the year both on the Smithfield and Smithfield, and beat Mr. Stratton's crack gold medal shorthorn steer from the bargain. Parts of the second and third prize volumes of the "Shorthorn Herd Book" have arrived of late. The Coronay herd has had an accession in a Royal Butterfly ball calf from Windsor, a daughter of Baronet Duchess 2nd, and a third cow of Mr. Eastwood's Rosette (winner of the two Irish cups last year) a heifer calf by Nicholas. Mr. Dudhouse's herd graduates in number as perfect congress of infant Prince Talleyrands. The heifer calves from Lady Laura, Water Queen, Cassandra, and Necklace have been named Lunette, Ocean Queen, Lucius, and Necklace, and the bull calves from Rose Duchess, Acacia, and Florence are Royal Butterfly, Royal Rifleman. The whole of the cows and heifers roam, and we believe that Ocean Queen (half brother to the Great Eastern and Paris Prize ox at present the favourites for choice. The Holker herd has received an accession in a third bull calf, a heifer calf from the Countess of Oxford (one of that well-known Oxford set who tempted so many enthusiastic agriculturists to grimst to take a run down there last season); and we believe that, so far, the male of this celebrated bull's stock have been heifers. The Gwynnes as well as the Oxfords are also a great deal in vogue, and one of them (Minstrel 2nd) has just had a rom Eighth Duke Oxford heifer.

The Farmers Club have selected their seven yearly subjects for discussion, namely—February 6, The Sewerage of Towns as it affects British Agriculture (Mr. Alderman Mechi); March 5, The Over-preservation of Game (Mr. H. Corbet). April 2, The Merits of Pure-bred and Cross-bred Cattle (C. Howard). May 7, Clover, how growing on the Lois Weedon system (Mr. J. A. Clarke). June 4, To what extent has the Farmer been benefited by the substitution of Steam Power for Horse and Manual Labour (Mr. J. Wells). July 2, The Public and Private Trials of Agricultural Implements; can they be made more efficient? (Mr. C. Robbs) and August 6, Recent Social Condition of the Labourer in England and Scotland, and his State on the Continent (Mr. S. Burn). The club congresses across the members, and we suppose that in due time it will have a building of its own.

The prospectus has been issued of a Winter Palace and Yacht Hotel Company to be established in the neighbourhood of Torquay.

THE ROYAL OPERA.—During the representation of a ballet in the theatre of Trevino, a city in the Venetian provinces, the conflagration spread and artistes fearing a panic, by one of the performers were such as to evoke the most rapturous expressions of applause on the part of the audience, and hastened together in unusual numbers on account of the present festive season of the year, to the great increase of the anxiety of the Minute—the consequence of the unhappy issue of political events. According to the Times the ballet was unusually well executed, wreaths and nosegays proceeding from every part of the house, and the whole performance was, in fact, a complete success. The ballet instructed in the part she was to play, selected from the floral tribute which lay at her feet, twined wreaths—green, the other red and the third white—blended them together, and, advancing to the footlights, with a graceful and delighted air, presented the patriotic plaudits of the multitude, and with fervid significance pressed the national colours to her bosom. The effect was electrical. The audience responded to the demonstration with the rapid and spontaneous vehemence of a people. The Italian tricolour immediately was greeted with frantic and deafening acclamations. Terpsichore, invested with the attributes of Athena Promachos, the guardian divinity of Greece, achieved a triumph. On the following morning the father of the girl was summoned before the police. What was the consternation of his wife and family when they learned that all complicity in the events of the preceding night was entirely disclaimed! An admonition for the future, and the necessary mandation to preserve the appearance of a similar scandal, by giving strict orders to his daughter henceforth to refuse all testimonies of popular approbation, and remorsefully to trample under foot all wreaths and flowers that might be thrown to her. On the latter promised obedience, and the peace was announced for repetition. On the second performance, the first acknowledgment of her skill was an enormous group of yellow immortelles, bound with a blue girl advanced, as on the first occasion, exhibited the black and yellow cockade in the view of the whole house, and then deliberately placed it under her feet. If the excitement was great before it was now increased a hundredfold. The outburst that followed baffles all description, and ended in the abrupt termination of the performances and the closing of the theatre for the remainder of the season.

On following evenings these phenomena were witnessed by another professor of Upsal, M. Lindblad, and on successive evenings by many other persons. Hooker's contribution on the origin and development of the Pitcher, of that remarkable plant the Nepenthes, with an account of some new Bornean plants of that genus. The plates are exceedingly interesting. Dr. J. B. Hicks continues his remarks on the organs of the antennæ (or feelers) of insects; and Mr. G. Bentham describes and illustrates a new species of Henriquezia, a beautiful plant discovered by Mr. Spence in Brazil and Venezuela.

PROFESSOR FARADAY'S CHRISTMAS LECTURES AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.—In the third lecture (on Wednesday, the 4th inst.) the consideration of the attraction of cohesion was resumed, and its modification and destruction, by the application of the powers of heat and chemical affinity, demonstrated. A red-hot ball on a block of ice changed a portion of the ice successively into the liquid state, as water, and the gaseous state as steam. Some iodine was heated by which its beautiful purple vapour was produced. A freezing mixture (ice and salt) was used to show that the heat, absorbed by the ice becoming liquid, caused the vessel containing it to become so cold as to freeze to the board on which it stood. By the voltaic battery water was decomposed into its elements, the gases oxygen (eight parts) and hydrogen (one part). Their chemical affinities were shown by their recombining and becoming water on receiving a charge from the electrical apparatus termed a Leyden jar. Oxygen is much heavier than hydrogen, which is the lightest element in nature. Oxygen is the great supporter of combustion, while hydrogen is itself combustible. The lecture was concluded by several brilliant experiments—viz., burning iron filings, a wax taper, and other substances in jars of oxygen. In the fourth lecture, oxygen and hydrogen were again brought forward as illustrations of the powers of chemical affinity. Hydrogen was obtained from diluted sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol) in which pieces of zinc were placed. The oxygen in the water combined with the zinc, and the hydrogen was thus set free. The lightness of hydrogen (the gas employed in balloons) was shown, a soap-bubble filled with it rising rapidly to the ceiling. Mr. Faraday inhaled the gas and blew it into the soap-bubble—too dangerous an experiment for boys; as even Sir Humphry Davy nearly lost his life by breathing this gas. The lecture was concluded by remarks on the beautiful phenomena of combustion, illustrated by burning gun-cotton, gunpowder, ether, and coal gas and various coloured fires. The production of water by combustion (by the hydrogen of the substance burnt combining with the oxygen in the air) was demonstrated, and a summary was given of the phenomena of heat, its sources, and powers of expansion, &c. The fifth lecture (on Friday) was devoted to electricity and magnetism. The distinction between these forces and gravitation and cohesion was pointed out. The phenomena of electric excitement and the consequent attractions and repulsions were shown and familiarly explained. Some strips of paper (suspended as a large tassel from the ceiling) brought into connection with the machine at first attracted and then immediately repelled each other. The rapid conduction of electricity compared with that of heat was demonstrated; and was further illustrated by Professor Faraday standing on an insulated stool, and, connecting himself with the electric machine, a spark from his knuckles set fire to a jet of gas. Magnetism was introduced by showing the powers of a piece of natural loadstone and of a large horseshoe magnet. A lathe of wood balanced on a watch became an indicator of the dual power of some bar magnets—one end of each repelling the indicator, the other attracting. The centre of the magnets was shown to be neutral; yet when one was broken in the middle the new ends exhibited similar powers of attracting and repelling (termed polarity). On Saturday the course was concluded with the delivery of the sixth lecture, the subject being voltaic electricity and electro-magnetism. The powers of the voltaic battery, as Professor Faraday demonstrated, are due to the exertion of the chemical affinities of two metals and the acid and water employed in its construction. The metals zinc and copper were selected for this purpose. The identity of the electricity produced from this battery with that generated by friction, though different in degree, was clearly shown by experiments. The action of the latter is evanescent, that of the former is continuous—as shown in the electric telegraph, &c. The points of a powerful Grove's battery were applied to a piece of charcoal in a vacuum; great light was produced, but the charcoal was not consumed—thus showing that the power was due to the action upon zinc in the battery. Pieces of platinum, silver, and iron wire were burnt by the heat produced by chemical action conducted by the wire. The connection of this battery with a coil of copper wire inclosing a core of soft iron gave the core great magnetic power—therefore termed electro-magnetic—in which, thus combined, the chemical, electric, and magnetic forces are able to overcome to a great extent the gravitating force, as was shown in many beautiful and interesting experiments. A large electro-magnet attracted bars of iron so powerfully that the utmost exertion of Professor Faraday's strength could not separate them. By permission of the professor this interesting course of lectures will be reported in full in the new scientific weekly periodical, the Chemical News, in which is incorporated the Chemical Gazette. Two lectures, illustrated with woodcuts, have already appeared.

THE AMSTERDAM CRYSTAL PALACE.—We learn from the Builder that this building, which is now being erected on the site of the Utrecht Gate, from the designs of Mr. C. Outshoorn, architect, of Amsterdam, is to be a permanent structure, and will be a great addition to the architecture of that ancient city. The total length of the building is 412 feet; the general width, 172 feet; and the width at the transept, 224 feet. The skeleton of the building is entirely constructed of iron; and, externally, woodwork is only employed for the main cornices, the rest being of iron also. The general plan consists of a nave, 64 feet wide, with side aisles, 19 feet 6 inches wide; a central transept-hall, 136 feet by 68 feet, with polygonal ends; and two side halls, each 150 feet by 34 feet, on each side of the nave; the side halls and vestibules at each end of the transept being separated from the nave and transept by close partitions and glazed iron gates. A gallery, 19 feet 4 inches wide, and 29 feet 6 inches above the floor level, is continued round the whole of the nave and transept, and communicates with saloons over the vestibules at the entrances. The total cost of the structure is estimated at £95,000.

DISCOVERY OF A NEW PLANET.—M. Leverrier, the discover of the planet Neptune, has just announced to the Academy of Sciences, Paris, the existence of another planet between Mercury and the Sun. In September last this distinguished astronomer communicated to the Academy an error in the motion of the perihelion of Mercury, which could only be explained on the assumption of another planet existing in the position indicated. It appears, however, that the new planet, prior to the announcement of M. Leverrier, had been discovered several months ago by a physician, Dr. Lescarbault, at Orgères (Eure-et-Loire). On the 26th of March last Dr. Lescarbault took an observation of the Sun, and observed a small round black spot pass over the Sun's disc. This result he forwarded to M. Leverrier, according to whose calculations the chord described by the planet must have subtended an arc of 9 minutes and 17 seconds, so that the doctor, with his primitive apparatus, was only four seconds wrong. The doctor estimates the diameter of the new planet at 310 leagues, and the inclination of its orbit to the ecliptic at 12 degrees. If such are its dimensions, it is likely that there are more planets still in that region. Its revolution round the Sun is performed in 19 days and 17 hours; in its greatest elongations its distance from the Sun does not exceed 7 degrees, while Mercury's maximum elongation is 25 degrees.——Mr. Benjamin Scott, City Chamberlain, states that he saw the body alluded to in 1847, and that it was seen by Mr. Lloft, an Englishman, in 1818. It is Mr. Scott's opinion that there are at least two planets between Mercury and the Sun.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE President of the United States has delivered his Message to Congress, although no Speaker has been yet elected in the House of Representatives. The following is a summary:—

I firmly believe that events at Harper's Ferry, by causing the people to pause and reflect, will be the means, under Divine Providence, of allaying the existing excitement, and preventing further outbreaks of a similar character.

For the suppression of slavery all lawful means at my command have been employed, and shall continue to be employed, to execute the laws against the African slave trade. Those engaged in this unlawful enterprise have been rigorously prosecuted, but not with so much success as the crimes have deserved. A number of them are under prosecution.

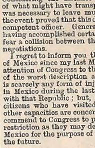
The wisdom of the course pursued by Government towards China has been verified by late events. Our treaty of peace and commerce with that empire, which was concluded at Tien-Tsin on June 18, 1858, was ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the 21st of December following. The ratifications of the treaty were afterwards, on the 16th of August, exchanged in proper form in China. As the exchange did not take place till after the day prescribed by the treaty it is deemed proper, before its publication, again to submit it to the Senate.

Our relations with the great empires of France and Russia, as well as on the Continent of Europe, unless we except that of Spain, happily continue to be of the most friendly character. In my last annual Message I presented a statement of the unsatisfactory condition of our relations with Spain, and I regret they have not materially improved. Without special reference to other claims, the payment of which has been ably urged by our Ministers, and in which more than a hundred of our citizens are directly interested, they still remain unsatisfied, notwithstanding their justice, and though their amount, 128,655 dols. 54 c., has been admitted by the Spanish Government.

I need not repeat the arguments which I urged in my last Message in favour of the acquisition of Cuba by fair purchase. My opinion on that measure is unchanged. I again invite your serious attention to this subject. Without a recognition of this policy on their part it will be almost impossible to institute negotiations with any reasonable prospect of success.

Until a recent period there was good reason to believe that I should be able to announce to you on the present occasion that our difficulties with Great Britain, arising out of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, had been fully adjusted in a manner alike honourable and satisfactory to both parties. From causes, however, which the British Government have not anticipated, they have not completed treaty arrangements with the Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua in pursuance of the understanding between the two Governments. It is, nevertheless, confidently expected that this good work will soon be accomplished.

While indulging the hope that no other subject remained which could disturb the good relations between the two countries, the question arising out of the adverse claims of the parties to the island of San Juan, under the Oregon Treaty of June 15th, 1846, suddenly assumed a threatening prominence. In order to prevent unfortunate collisions on that remote frontier, the local Government was instructed that the officers of the territory should abstain from all acts on the disputed ground calculated to provoke any conflicts, as far as it could be done without implying the concession to the authorities of Great Britain of an exclusive right over the territory, and that the title ought to be settled before either party should attempt to exclude the other by force, or exercise sovereign rights within the fairly-disputed limits. Much excitement prevailed for some time throughout that region. Serious danger of a collision between the parties was apprehended. The British had a large naval force in the vicinity, and it is an act of simple justice to the Admiral on that station to state that he wisely forbore to commit any hostile acts, but determined to refer the whole affair to his Government, and await their instructions. This aspect of the matter, in my opinion, demanded attention, to prevent any act of hostility from taking place. Lieut.-General Scott was dispatched on the 17th of September last to take command of the United States' forces if necessary. Considering the distance from the scene of action, and in ignorance of what might have transpired on the spot before the General's arrival, it was necessary to leave much to his discretion; and I am happy to state the event proved that this discretion could not have been intrusted to a more competent officer. General Scott has recently returned from his mission, having accomplished certain objects, and there is no longer good reason to fear a collision between the force of the two countries during the existing negotiations.



I regret to inform you that there has been no improvement of the affairs of Mexico since my last Message, and I am again obliged to ask the earnest attention of Congress to the unhappy condition of that Republic. Outrages of the worst description are committed on persons and property. There is scarcely any form of injury which has not been suffered by our citizens in Mexico during the last few years. We have been nominally at peace with that Republic; but, so far as the interests of our commerce or of our citizens who have visited the country as merchants, shipmasters, or in other capacities are concerned, we might as well have been at war. I recommend to Congress to pass a law authorising the President, under such restriction as they may deem necessary, to employ military force against Mexico for the purpose of obtaining indemnity for the past and security for the future.

The Journal de St. Petersbourg announces that the commerce of Russian subjects in China meets with no impediment, and that the members of the lay and ecclesiastical mission enjoy every desirable protection and liberty both at Pekin and in the neighbourhood.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

COLONEL PINCKNEY.

COLONEL F. G. A. Pinckney, C.B., was the only son of Lieutenant-Colonel George Pinckney, late of the 82nd Regiment, and entered the British Army as Ensign in 1825 from the Military College. He became Captain in 1836, Major in 1845, Lieutenant-Colonel in 1854, and Colonel in 1856. He served with his regiment in the Mediterranean, in Canada during the rebellion there, in Ireland, and at Monte Video. He was at the head of his regiment during the Kaffir War in 1846 and 1847, under the command of General Sir George Berkeley, K.C.B., and in the Kaffir Wars of 1851, 1852, and 1853, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sir H. G. Smith, G.C.B., and Sir George Cathcart, K.C.B. He was present at the passage of the Great Kie River in 1851, when he commanded his regiment—the 73rd. He was also at the Battle of Berea, in December, 1852, in command of the 2nd Brigade of Infantry. Pinckney was specially mentioned in general orders by Sir H. G. Smith and Sir George Cathcart, and was created G.C.B. for his gallant and distinguished conduct. He commanded the district of the Amatola Mountains until ordered to proceed to India on the 7th of April, 1858. In the August of that year he was in command (with the rank of Brigadier) of the Soruon field force and the Sultanpore district, South Oude, but, returning thence with his regiment on board the flat Gogra, he fell a victim to the climate, and died on the 11th of November, 1859, deeply regretted by the officers and soldiers of the 73rd. Lieutenant-Colonel Pinckney belonged to the old family of the Pinckneys, or Pinchini, of Bucks, Notts, and Surrey.

LORD JOHN DOUGLAS SCOTT.

LORD John Douglas Montague Douglas Scott, whose death has just occurred, was the third son (and the second to survive youth) of Charles William Henry, fourth and late Duke of Buccleuch, by his wife, Harriet Katherine, youngest daughter of Thomas, first Viscount Sydney, and was the youngest brother of Walter Francis, fifth and present Duke of Buccleuch. He was born on the 13th of July, 1809, and served for some time in the British Army. He married, on the 16th of March, 1836, Alicia Anne, eldest daughter of John Spottiswoode, Esq., of Spottiswoode, N.B., but had no issue.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL MARTIN LEAKE.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL William Martin Leake, Royal Artillery, F.R.S., &c., and honorary LL.D., Oxford, the eminent Eastern geographer, whose death, after a short illness, occurred on the 5th inst., at Brighton, just upon the completion of his 83rd year, was the scion of an ancient and highly respectable Essex family—the Martin Leakes of Thorpe Hall—and was the younger son of the late John Martin Leake, and the brother of the present John Martin Leake, Esq., of Thorpe Hall, near Colchester, a Bencher of the Middle Temple, and one of the Chairmen of the Essex Quarter Sessions, and was the grandson of Stephen Martin Leake, Garter King-of-Arms. Lieutenant-Colonel Leake served for some years in the Royal Artillery, but retired, having attained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in 1813. The gallant officer was an indefatigable traveller: he had been over every portion of Greece and Asia Minor, and he gave to the world the results of his researches in several very learned and scholarlike productions, which were published by Murray, between the years 1813 and 1830. Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Leake had only recently completed the supplement to his last work, "Numismata Hellenica," when the hand of death cut short his useful and erudite labours. His name will long be remembered as the author of "Travels in Asia Minor," "A Journey in Greece," "Athenian Topography," and "Travels in the Morea," besides some shorter pamphlets, in which he called the attention of the home Government to the oppression to which the modern Greeks were at that time subjected at the hands of those Turkish masters who now hold them in bondage no longer. Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Leake married Charlotte, daughter of Sir Charles Wilkins, and relict of W. Marsdon, Esq., F.R.S., but had no issue.

MRS. CHARLOTTE ANGELL EVERY.

THIS lady, who resided for many years at Old Park, near Dover, died at Ramsgate on the 2nd ult., in her eighty-eighth year. She was widow of John Every, Esq., a magistrate of the county of Kent, and brother of the late Sir Henry Every, Bart., of Eggington, Derbyshire. The deceased lady was the only child of William Osborn, a physician of great eminence in his day. She was descended from Philemon Holland, the learned translator of Pliny's "Natural History," and of many other classic authors; and, as the great-grandchild of Philemon Angell, of Teston, in the county of Rutland, she held a lien upon the large estates known as "The Angell." She was god-daughter of Mrs. Chapone, the authoress of the sensible "Letters on the Improvement of the Mind, addressed to a Young Lady," and in her childhood had been the pet of the celebrated Mrs. Montague. Many of the notabilities of that lady's select society had been amongst her acquaintance. Mrs. Every was singular for her abstemious habits. Though not wholly, she might almost be called a total abstainer from wine or strong drinks, so rarely had she known their taste. Water was her principal drink. Fish, cheese, and beer she had never tasted; salt, pepper, and mustard she had never partaken of, except as those condiments came to table in the cooked victuals. Advised by her father, the learned physician, to take only the green quality in the use of tea, as was his custom, she pursued the advice through her long life. Whether it was owing to the above-mentioned particularities of diet we cannot say, but we are able to inform our readers that Mrs. Every was of very cheerful temperament, and enjoyed the best of health, and was spared from some of those epidemic sicknesses from all or from some of which so very few escape; and she died with so slight an illness, and so suddenly and so calmly, that her friends could scarcely believe she had expired till the medical man who had been called in assured them of the melancholy fact.

THE FUNERAL OF LORD MACAULAY.

ON Monday the mortal remains of Thomas Babington Lord Macaulay were, with due honour and ceremony, deposited in Westminster Abbey, there to rest, side by side, with the ashes of a glorious company of England's departed worthies.

Shortly before twelve the private procession was formed at the deceased Peer's residence, Holly Lodge, Campden Hill. The family cortége consisted of a hearse drawn by six horses, three mourning-coaches, and a brougham; and the chief mourners were the Rev. J. Macaulay and Mr. Macaulay, jun., C. L. Macaulay, Esq., and George Trevelyan, Esq. The procession, after leaving Holly Lodge, turned down Campden Hill, and entered the main road of Kensington. Here a considerable number of persons had gathered, and by their demeanour testified their sense of the greatness of the loss which the nation had sustained. The shops were nearly all partially closed, and as the procession passed on the bell of Kensington parish church tolled in solemn recognition. Having received a considerable accession of followers in its progress, the procession continued its route by Kensington Gardens, where crowds of persons lined the railings, gazing with deep interest on the scene. By the time that Knightsbridge was reached, the public character of the ceremony became clearly marked. At Hyde Park-corner there was a dense throng of persons; and here the carriages of noblemen and others, in accordance with the arrangements, swelled the procession, now no longer private, but an impressive testimonial to the character and genius of the deceased. The procession was now of an enormous length, probably a hundred vehicles having been added to it, and as it continued down Grosvenor-place the spectacle was one of imposing solemnity. Here, too, a long line of carriages was drawn up by the roadside, partly to allow the cavalcade to pass, and partly, no doubt, to afford the occupants an opportunity of witnessing its passage. On the steps and at the windows of the houses were also a large number of spectators. The route from Grosvenor-place was through Lower Grosvenor-place into Victoria-road, which was entered at twenty-five minutes to one, by Buckingham Palace, and through Birdcage-walk. In the pathway of St. James's Park skirting this thoroughfare were large bodies of spectators, who became increasingly numerous as the procession neared George-street.

When the hearse reached the abbey the coffin was received by the pallbearers and the numerous friends of the deceased historian who had congregated at the door of the cathedral. A procession was then formed in the following order:—

High Constable of Westminster.
The Almsmen of the Abbey.
Sixteen Boys of the Choir.
The Sub-Dean.
Canons—Repton, Jennings, and Cureton.
The Dean (Rev. Dr. Trench).

Those who had the honour of assisting as pall-bearers were:—

The Lord Chancellor,	The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Lord John Russell,	Bishop of Oxford,
Dr. Millman, Dean of St. Paul's,	Sir Henry Holland, Bart.,
Sir David Dundas,	Sir G. C. Lewis,
Earl of Carlisle,	Earl Stanhope.

Close behind the coffin, in order, followed the mourners.

The congregation included distinguished representatives of both Houses of Parliament, of the clergy, of literature and science, the bar, the army and navy, and other leading professions.

The service was commenced by the Rev. Canon Jennings. As the coffin was borne onwards to the choir the choristers sang the fine composition of Purcell, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." "And now (says the London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian) the coffin halts under the doorway of the choir—the choristers, and the Dean and Sub-Dean, and Canons, and the mourners, and the pallbearers, have taken their places—and the sweet and solemn words of St. Paul have been read, and again the organ has rolled out the massive music of Spohr's 'Blessed are the dead that die trusting in the Lord.' Once more the coffin is lifted up, and, turning aside to the right, by the southern aisle, the sad procession wends its way—the choir chanting Purcell's pathetic anthem 'Man that is born of woman' amid a gradual swaying of the crowd nearer and nearer to the barriers, and a standing on tip-toe, or stool, or bench, or lectern, or any other foothold that may aid the sight. And now the Dean has taken his place at the head of the grave—the Sub-Dean at the foot—the coffin has been lowered into its resting-place, the earth flung upon the lid, dust has been assigned to dust, and ashes to ashes, amid sorrow—mute or loud, hidden or visible—while a sad, sweet, Handelian chant—'His body is buried in peace, but his name liveth for evermore'—attunes all hearts to the solemn mood that befits the occasion. All is over. The mourners have looked their last, and gone home in their sorrow. The pallbearers, the Ministers and nobles, the Viceroy and Secretary for Ireland, the Home and Foreign Secretaries, and the others who have stood by their side near the grave during the ceremonial, are passing back through the crowded aisle; and the solemn strain of 'The Dead March in Saul' makes a fitting accompaniment for the long line of hushed spectators that now defiles from the transept and the choir to cast a parting glance at Macaulay's coffin in its grave.

The outer coffin, which is of polished elm, contains a leaden coffin and a shell. The coffin lid is in three compartments, the upper one bearing on an engraved plate the arms of the deceased Peer. The second compartment contains the following inscription:—"The Right Honourable Thomas Babington Macaulay, Baron Macaulay, of Rothwell, born 25th Oct., 1800. Died 28th Dec., 1859." At the lower part of the lid is a small shield with the initials of the deceased Peer, "T. B. M." The coffin is ornamented with massive gilt handles, three upon each side, and one on each end, surmounted with coronets, and the surface is covered with black silk velvet, and is decorated in the usual style of funeral ornamentation.

The resting-place of Macaulay is near the wall on the west side of Poets' Corner, which is thickly covered with monuments, and immediately faces the visitor as he enters by the small and quaint old doorway forming the entrance from Old Palace-yard. "It was impossible," says one who was present at the funeral, and from whom we have already quoted, "to look on that open grave—the full-length statue of Addison at its head, the yet spotless marble of Campbell at its foot—and around the monuments inscribed with the names best known on England's literary beadroll, and not to feel that, if Macaulay was prosperous in his life, successful and popular beyond parallel in his labours, and honoured and regretted as few have been in his passing away, so has he been fortunate in the place of his burial."

The scene our Artist has depicted shows the spot where now repose the mortal remains of Lord Macaulay. The choristers, heading the procession from the nave to the foot of Addison's statue in Poets' Corner, are taking up their position on the right-hand side of the grave, and just under the great window of the south transept.

These pills are supplied to the public (through agents only) by the proprietor, Mr. F. A. RICHARDSON, Long Ditton, Surrey, in boxes at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each; and may be had of all dealers in patent medicines.

LONDON NEWS.

No. 1013.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, M.P., FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY HERBERT WATKINS.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 65.

THE COMING SESSION.

It hardly needs a recollection of the events of the two last legislative years to justify the assertion that one of the least safe subjects of anticipation is a Session of Parliament. The contrast between the promise of February and the consummation of July has been unusually strong in 1858 and 1859; but the abstract condition of things in this respect is normal, and to a great extent immutable. Time after time we witness the production of a cornucopia of measures in the early spring, which in the late summer has dwindled into a delusive memory. It can hardly be supposed that the Session which is before us will be an exception to that rule which experience has taught us will inevitably prevail, namely, that if no bill of the first class has culminated into a great Act of Parliament it is a very fair product of a Session. Around this main work of course cluster a thousand and one minor measures which dribble through the set period of legislation and become law by a machinery which makes little or no sound in its action. It is, therefore, a work which bears with it few elements of encouragement to sit down and predicate the results of a coming Session. Nevertheless, it is not only possible, but it has a certain fitness and appropriateness, for us to consider what are the hopes and what ought to be the duties of the Legislature and the Government.

If we look to the situation as it is constituted by the state of affairs at home and abroad, there is much, indeed everything, to justify an expression of opinion that on few occasions has a Ministry met Parliament under more advantageous circumstances. If ever there was a period when a sound, at the same time that it is an enthusiastic, public spirit was universal in England, it is now. There is not only not the least evidence of a desire of any section of the population to do otherwise than to leave the conduct of affairs in the hands of our constitutional authorities, but the healthy and vigorous state of the public mind affords to our rulers the best inducements and the most powerful support. It cannot be misunderstood by those whose business it is to be acquainted with the relative causes and effects of a nation's strength that the proud attitude in which England stands at this moment before Europe is owing to the manifestation of that earnest feeling of patriotism and that display of self-respect which pervades the whole mass of the people.

Much weaker and less experienced statesmen than those who now hold the reins of power might well be able to maintain the rights and vindicate the honour of England with such a national disposition at their command as exists in the country at the present moment. France armed, and trebly confident in their own intentions, the justice and prudence of their policy, and the support derived from a stirring exhibition of national character and power, her Majesty's Ministers have achieved much. They will be able to say before Parliament that the first more perfect alliance with France that has ever yet been created. The baptism of blood before Sebastopol did much, but now we witness the beginning of a community of ideas and a unity of action in reference to European policy and to our own interests, which is no longer a interchange of barren sentiment or a generous rivalry in arms against a common foe, to which we are to look as the foundation of the alliance between France and England. The confidence which we born of the commingling of those interests was a plant of rapid growth and showy appearance; but it is to be doubted if it was imbedded in a soil of sufficient depth to give hope of permanent vigour. But a reciprocity which consists in the continuous interweaving of material interests, which consists in a daily barter of commodities on the principle of free commercial intercourse, is calculated to be as abiding as it is powerful. In the abstract concerns of Europe and the world the Governments of France and England have adopted a common idea. This is much, for it brings with it the strongest guarantee for peace and tranquillity in the relations of the two countries abroad. The next step is natural and obvious, and the Emperor of the French has declared his resolve to do all that in him lies to make it easy and assured.

In this hopeful state of things it surely becomes the duty of Parliament to lend its aid in every possible shape to the perfecting of an alliance which, starting from such principles, must become more productive of good, not only to the countries which are its immediate objects, but to the whole world, in proportion as it becomes more intimate. France and England, each in its peculiar sphere, and in its peculiar development of civilisation, are the exemplars of the world: combined they constitute a power which, either by its influence or its acting, is simply irresistible.

With some, perhaps many, of the details towards the completion of this alliance Parliament will have much to do. Measures involving those details must be prescribed for the consideration of the Legislature in the ensuing Session. The Ministry and the people, each in their vocation, have done their best towards it—a bringing about of this condition of affairs; it remains for Parliament to do theirs. One of the modes by which our great country may be enabled to contribute to a consummation which we have endeavoured to show is so desirable will be by affording a fair and generous support to Lord Palmerston's Government. No man has questioned the individual and aggregate ability of the present Cabinet. It is not to be denied that it consists of the picked men of the Liberal party who have made their claims heard, and it is to little to be controverted that, considering the antecedents of most of them, each and all have made some sacrifice of personal feeling in order that a Government might be constituted which would ensure the greatest possible amount of capable administrat ion of affairs at home, and command the greatest power and moral weight, with the greatest weight, abroad. Of the latter influence we have seen some, and no insignificant, proofs; as regards the former we have had some experience, and we have some promise for the future.

It is not merely reasonable, but it is imperative on us to suppose that by the Ministry under whose inspiration, or at least under whose auspices, the alliance with France—the value of which we have endeavoured to show—has been effected, is not only most likely to be preserved in its original integrity, but still further developed and assured. If the relations between the two Governments are so intimate and confidential as all things would lead us to believe, who shall say what peril to the good understanding which exists might not arise from the sudden intervention of new manipulators of the compact on the part of England? Even if the present Government deserved no forbearance, not to speak of gratitude—if the action which has brought about the confederacy between France and England had been of a one-sided, which we are not prepared to admit—if our Ministers had been mere passive agents in the matter, common tact and common prudence would dictate the advisability of not removing from power that body of men who have, even in such a state of things have been an influence, if they were nothing more. We believe that Lord Palmerston's name is still a power in the diplomacy of Europe; but in the present case we believe that he not only represents an abstract policy, but that he has been a moving agency in the events which have lately transpired in the New Year. The present accomplishment and the future stability of our alliance with France is, we venture to assert, coincident with the continuance of the existing Government in office.

If this view be established, it must become necessary to consider whether our immediate domestic affairs ought to be committed with confidence to the care of the present advisers of the Crown. Of course, the expectations of the public are directed, not with any violent or overweening excitement, towards the question of Reform in Parliament. Unless the vocal manifestations have been unusually deceitful, it would seem as if there was a feeling abroad that a measure reasonable and practically satisfactory to all parties may be looked for. Mr. Bright, in his characteristic style, proclaimed that the people were intolerable perspicuity his readiness to accept such a Reform Bill as Lord John Russell is pledged to. The Conservative party, as represented by Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, have declared, since the last election, how far they were prepared to go, at least in the Resolutions which at the close of last year Lord Russell has yet gone. What forbids, then, that a Reform Bill should pass easily through the Commons, and meet with tolerable weather even in its passage through the Lords? Taxation, revenue, and agriculture are questions which are undergoing a process of moulding in the nervous hands of Mr. Gladstone; and, if rumour is to be trusted, there will be remissions and revision of parts of our system of imposts which will be as popular as they will be just.

Without indulging more widely in speculation, or touching more minutely on details, it may be permitted us to say that, while we believe that there has not been for some time past a condition of affairs, both at home and abroad, more favourable for the safe and vigorous action of the Government of England, so there is every fair and reasonable ground for belief that we shall find an adequate wish and readiness on the part of the Government to do the duty which lies straight before them, not unaccompanied with repability to the country which they occupy. The two last Sessions of Parliament have been neutralised and dwarfed by the operations of party struggle and the fever of party change. Surely it is fitting, and to be required by the public voice, that the legislative attributes of the Session should be left undisturbed, and be devoted exclusively to the business of the country. In the best of all possible spirits the nation awaits the legislation of the year, and it has a right to demand that it be conducted diligently and faithfully in the Cabinet and in the Senate.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

A most important announcement appeared on Sunday in the official part of the Moniteur, in the shape of a letter from the Emperor Louis Napoleon to M. Fould, his Minister of State. In this letter (which forms part of the Supplement, a new 6G) the Emperor declares that "the moment has arrived for applying ourselves to the means of giving a greater development to the internal wealth of the nations which, consequently he communicates to his Minister the bases of the commercial reforms which he purposes to effect with the concurrence of the Senate and Legislative Body. In conclusion the Emperor states "I am anxious to inaugurate a new era of peace, and to secure its blessings to Europe."

Great activity prevails in the different Ministerial departments for the realisation of the programme contained in the letter of the Emperor to M. Fould. The Council of State has been called into consideration those measures which require the co-operation of the Legislative Body.

All the Paris papers testify to the good effect produced by the manner in which the Emperor's commercial projects have been received since the last was known. Everywhere it is considered as a still stronger assurance of a permanent good understanding between France and England.

Yesterday week the Emperor presided at a meeting of the Council of Ministers and of the Privy Council. The Empress was present.

A despatch from Vienna, dated Sunday, was received by last week. We now learn that his Lordship arrived at that capital last Tuesday morning, and that, on hearing an intimate understanding with England on the basis of non-intervention, it should be understood that the existing conditions involved in the engagements of Villafranca and the treaties of Zurich. This reserve has been removed, and the last war has strengthened the alliance of France. The assembling of the Congress is therefore still possible, its programme being founded on the treaties of Zurich. The Cabinet of the Tuileries has formally remanded the question concerning the Congress, and has by telegraph already informed the northern courts of this decision in Berlin.

The Moniteur of Thursday announces that M. Amedée Thierry has been nominated Senator, and M. de Laveaux Councillor of State.

The sitting of the Corps Législatif on Monday opened an important announcement that the prohibitions imposed by the French import duties would be withdrawn from 1st January, 1861, when they will be replaced by protective duties of 30 or 25 per cent ad valorem. Before the Emperor forms his final resolutions, however, he will ascertain the opinions of the leading manufacturers of France.

It is stated that the French Government is about to proceed against the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the most important of French charitable association in France, and that the Minister of the Interior has already informed all the public functionaries that they must choose between remaining members of that association and retaining their offices as public functionaries.

A letter from Paris states that the Rev. Mr. Gurney has received permission to open his chapel for all services, except the French, on Sunday next, and there is every reason to believe he will obtain full and legal authorisation to prosecute his clerical duties without further interference from the authorities. The semi-official Patrie says:—"The recent closing of this chapel was owing simply to an institution to the necessary technical forms necessary for the authorisation of such meetings. These regulations being about to be complied with, there will be no further interference with the chapel."

All the buildings of the Zoological Gardens in the Bois de Boulogne, between the Porte des Sablons and the Porte de Neuilly, are now nearly finished. The garden contains an area of thirty-five acres, intersected by an artificial river and by alleys for promenades in carriages, on horseback, or on foot.

London is likely to be deprived of its distinctive reputation for fogs. There was one so dense in Paris on Thursday and Friday evenings, last week, "that all circulation in the streets became a source of danger, and even lighted torches were placed in the principal streets by the police.

The Patrie and Liberté of Monday evening assert that the turnstiles for the payment of the admission fee to the Bourse will be abolished.

M. Girard, the leader of the orchestra of the Paris Opera, fell from his seat on Monday night during the representation of the "Huguenots," and died in the course of the night from the effects of the rupture of a blood-vessel.

Doctor Vries, commonly known as the "Black Doctor," has been sentenced by the Assize Court to Correctionnelle to imprisonment for fifteen months and a fine of 500 francs for swindling and for the illegal practice of medicine.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The Nord of Monday states that on the 19th of this month the Spanish Minister paid into the hands of Mr. Buchanan the whole sum which has been so long due to the British Government—about £400,000.

A telegram from Madrid announces that since Saturday Marshal O'Donnell's troops have been masters of all the mountains of the Negro, and adds—"After having obtained a complete victory, we are commanding all the heights of the valley of Tetuan." No details of the "complete victory" are given, nor is any statement made respecting the loss sustained by the Spaniards in gaining it. We are assured, however, that the Spanish army will be before Tetuan "as soon as the artillery is able to pass."

On Tuesday the Moors showed a disposition to attack the Spanish, but were thrown into disorder by the fire of the Spanish artillery. The projectiles nearly reached Tetuan, from which place the army was four miles distant. The Moorish army was encamped at the Sierra Dermejas.

Later advices from Madrid state that the division Rios had effected a landing on the banks of the River Tetuan without opposition, and that the forts did not reply to the fire of the Spanish squadron. Seven quarters of a bag, containing powder, were found in the forts of Tetuan. The Moors, we are informed, showed an intention of attacking the Spanish camp, but a few shells sufficed to disperse them. Every preparation has been made for passing the river and advancing on Tetuan.

The 12th regiment of infantry arrived yesterday week at Algesiras. Provisions and ammunition have been landed on the African coast. The wounded have embarked for Spain.

ITALY.

The official Piedmontese Gazette of Tuesday announces that the King has accepted the resignation of the Ministry, and has charged Count Cavour with the formation of a new Cabinet.

The official Journal de Rome declares to all Catholics interested in the preservation of the States of the Church that the Pope, obeying his conscience, has negatively replied to the counsels of the Emperor Napoleon. The official journal also states the reasons of the Pope's refusal to cede the province of Romagna, which is now in insurrection.

According to letters from Milan the carnival season has commenced with fetes, and balls, and receptions unknown under Austrian rule. The Opera House has been opened, and at Milan have added to the festivities of the Italians by receiving and giving dinners and balls to the officers of the armee of Victor Emanuel. The King is expected at Milan. The famed theatre La Scala has an excellent company this year. Giuglini is engaged to sing there for twelve nights, at the price of 2000*l.* for each night.

The Municipality of Piacenza has requested permission of the Government to build a bridge across the bed of the Trebbia, which weighs 4500 kilos., in order to have it melted and transformed into rifle cannon.

AUSTRIA.

The long-expected Imperial decree removing all civic disabilities from the professors of the Mosaic faith has at last appeared in the Vienna Correspondent. The provisions of this law will permit Jews from exercising certain professions, particularly that of apothecaries, keepers of wine-shops and brewers—in fact, all licenses of trade. Those laws are to be abolished which prohibit Jews from fixing their residence in the fat country of Galicia, in the mountains of Bohemia and Hungary, in Dalmatia, in Croatia, as well as in the Banat and Transylvania, in each of which provinces the former Austrian Governments had made some restriction with regard to the privileges of the Slavonic peasantry against the craftiness of commercial men of Jewish origin.

The new law which reaches us from Hungary discloses the usual discontent. The taxation imposed on agriculture is so excessive that many peasants have abandoned their farms, and have driven their live stock in Moldavia to avoid confiscation. Throughout Transylvania people have refused to pay the taxes. The authorities of Hungary have made most gloomy reports to Vienna. The troops recruited from Croatia have received orders, wherever they might be, to march to the Venetian dominions of the Austrians.

PRUSSIA.

The Staats Intelligencer says, in a communication from Potsdam, that the condition of the King has been satisfactory during the past week. The state of his Majesty has likewise continued such as a good appetite and sound sleep, have had a most beneficial influence upon his constitution, and his physicians are sanguine.

The Prussian Chambers were opened on Thursday week by the Prince Regent in person. In his speech (which appears to be the whole of our official documents) he stated that he had accepted the French and Austrian invitation to take part in a Congress for the pacification of Italy on the understanding that there should be a restore the Constitution of 1831 in Electoral Hesse; and the Prince Regent, in conjunction with his Ministers, would continue their endeavours to obtain a thorough the establishment of a lawful Constitution in the German Duchies of Holstein and Lauenburg. Among the measures of the Session will be one for the further improvement of the military service, the Government being determined that the "Prussian army shall be the Prussian people in arms."

The Duke of Montebello has applied to the French Government for leave, in order to accompany his wife, who is unable to habituate herself to the Northern climate, to reside with the Ambassador at least St. Petersburg as soon as the weather permits.

Prince Gortschakoff, the new Minister, arrived at St. Petersburg on the 8th inst, by express-train from Moscow. He proceeded to the Winter Palace, where apartments were specially prepared by the Grand Duke Constantine, brother of the Emperor, were prepared for him. The Imperial Aide-de-Camp Douvreur had been sent to him as the bearer of the Marshal's staff, which has been about 200 versts from Staroyzol. On the same day the new Marshal was present at a parade with the Emperor. His Imperial Majesty commanded it in person, and rendered military honours to the Prince. The Field Marshal, moved to tears, threw himself into the Emperor's arms. The spectators were deeply moved by the scene. The Prince, after a short stay at St. Petersburg, will return to Tiflis, having in the meantime submitted to the Emperor several important projects for the complete conquest of the countries bordering the Black Sea, and for the administrative organisation of the pacified provinces.

UNITED STATES.

No Speaker has yet been chosen by the House of Representatives at Washington. The last ballot left parties much in the same position as before: Mr. Sherman, the Republican candidate, recording 110 votes, and three short of the majority. The Opposition votes are still as divided as ever, the highest vote being 35.

According to his report, the Secretary of the Navy has been increased during the present Administration by the addition of twenty steam-vessels—thirteen by construction, and seven by purchase. He renews his recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, and, instead of perpetuating old vessels or expending millions in constructing a fleet of sailers, is it earnestly recommended to build a much larger number of steam-ships, which can be maintained at a comparatively small cost.

A Washington telegram says:—"Recent advices received here by our Government from Spain state that the pending difficulties between the two Governments are in a fair way of receiving a satisfactory adjustment. This intelligence has been received since the President's message was transmitted to Congress."

Several serious fires are reported, and at one of them, in Division-street, New York, six persons lost their lives, owing to insufficient means of egress from the premises.

The New York Herald says that a reign of terror is approaching in the Southern States pregnant with the most disastrous results to both sections of the Union. Travellers from the northern section of the Union are not only looked upon with suspicion in the Southern States, but in many sections of that region they are stopped in their travels, and obliged to give a satisfactory account of themselves and their business. If they have not some local acquaintance who can vouch for them, they are subjected to all the petty annoyances of the custom-house, and not unfrequently find themselves face to face with a vigilance committee, charged with the preservation of public order and the suppression from the country of northern abolitionists. This is particularly the case with the travelling agents of northern manufacturers and merchants, who, in consequence of the prevailing excitement, are looked upon with great suspicion.

We read in a Boston letter of "The State of Arkansas has passed a law to banish the negroes from its bounds, and it came into effect on the 1st day of January, 1860. Every free negro found there after that day will be sold into slavery for life. The Missouri Senate has before it a bill providing that all free negroes above six years of age who shall be found in that State after September, 1860, shall be sold into slavery; and that all such negroes as shall enter the State after September, 1861, and remain there twenty-four hours, shall also be sold into slavery for life. Another bill is legislating in the same way; and so are Kentucky and Tennessee. I suppose that a law of the United States will be the next bills ripen into laws, but that they should have been brought forward is a most disgraceful circumstance."

A correspondent writes to the legislature, protesting against the toleration of free negroes, is in circulation in Maryland, who contains the following paragraph:—"We have about four months more to pass laws enslaving our free negroes for life to our own citizens, to be accompanied by an exemption from sale under execution for debt."

A shocking case of lynching has taken place in Columbia, South Carolina. James Power, a shoemaker, and a native of Ireland, with a number of other men of his trade of different nationalities, was employed in the construction of the Columbia Rail-road of Georgia, when the pro-slavery committee of vigilance of the mid town got wind of some remarks of Power of an abolition character. The results were disgraceful although not fatal. After a long whipping, the infliction of twenty-nine lashes upon his bare back, after which he was served with a tar and feathers, and in this condition was sent down by railroad to Charleston, where he was conducted to prison, and thence, after a confinement of several days, shipped to New York.

Nine Americans were killed and sixteen wounded. Among the latter was Captain Ford, who led the attack. Cortines fled across the river.

The Diet of Denmark, at its last sitting, discussed a motion brought forward by M. Bardod for the separation of Church and State; and on a division, decided by a large majority that it should be read a second time. The city of Copenhagen has been the theatre of nightly riots since New-Year's Eve, springing from the unpopularity of the King's wife—the Countess Danner—once a milliner's girl—by name of Rasmussen—as well as hatred to the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron Bitzen-Ehrlefe. These riots have become of a violent character, and the Riot Act has twice been read, and a number of arrests have been made among the leading rioters.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) morning:—

MARSEILLES, Jan. 19.—M. Thouvenel has arrived here, and will leave this evening for Paris. M. de Lesseps has also arrived. Letters from Constantinople to the 12th instant report that Rapoly Pasha was about to return to office, Sir Henry Bulwer having expressed to the Sultan the displeasure of the English Government at his dismissal. M. Thouvenel had, before leaving for Paris, insisted upon receiving a more precise declaration respecting the Suez Canal project. Advices from Athens to the 12th inst. state that a change of Ministry was shortly expected.

TURIN, Jan. 19.—The slight indisposition of the King continues, and, in consequence, the reception of Baron de Talleyrand, who was to present his credentials, has been re-fixed to-day, the 20th inst. The following will probably be the list of the new Ministry:—Foreign Affairs, Signor Farini; War, Signor Fanti; Finance, Signor Cavour; Signor Mamiani; Finance, Signor Jacini; Justice, Signor Cassini; Public Works, Signor Jacini. For the Ministry of Interior M. Depretis, Desambrois, Signor Farini, and Signor Casella are spoken of, but nothing has yet been decided.

Adolphe Barrot, at present Ambassador at Madrid, to succeed M. Thouvenel at Constantinople; the Duc de Grammont, Ambassador to Rome, in the room of M. Barrot; the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne to be raised to the rank of Ambassador at the Papal Court; M. de Billing, Chef du Cabinet Particulier (private secretary) to the Emperor, to be Political Department of the Ministry for Foreign affairs, replacing M. Armand Lefèbvre, who is to return.

M. LESCARBAULT'S PLANET.

The following letter from Professor Hind appears in the Times of Monday:—

"There is a peculiarity in the orbit of a planet circumstanced as the one seen by M. Lescarbault, which deserves the attention of astronomers of attention, affording, as it does, ground for hope that another observation will very soon be obtained. The orbit of the planet observed on the sun is included within Gauss-limits borne to the whole period of revolution. Adopting the mean of the two circular orbits given by M. Lescarbault, the results of the calculation from M. Lescarbault's data, it appears that transits over the sun's disc will occur when the ascending node of the planet's orbital node at conjunction is less than seven degrees and a half, and, consequently, half for either node for about a week before and after. Passage through the node (or during fifteen days in all) the planet may be projected upon the sun's disc for a period of about seventeen hours. As it is already evident that the period of revolution is under twenty days, it will be obvious that there is a probability that in the course of a few years the planet's path will earth remains within the limiting distance of visibility from the line of the sun, and, while in proximity to the sun's disc.

"Now, in 1860 the earth will reach the planet's descending node at noon on the 2nd of January, and in 1861 at 6 P.M. on the 4th of January, and soon after midnight on the 9th of October; a transit may therefore happen in the former year between the 26th of December and the 5th of January, the 25th of September and the 13th of October. It is very desirable that the first of these transits should not be allowed to pass without the most careful and careful examination of the sun, by which there is a high probability the planet's orbit will be determined with sufficient accuracy for the future; and on the nature of its orbit being more accurately determined, we should be better enabled to form a correct judgment of the probability that such an early reference to this circumstance in the Times may have the effect of procuring for the discovery the honour of a name.

"The planet of M. Lescarbault, according to M. Leverrier's elements, cannot be seen upon the sun's disc except when the transit takes place centrally, so that neither the dark spot said to have been remarked in January, 1818, nor that which M. Lescarbault has observed, can have any real or direct connection with it. There is only one observation of the kind with which I am acquainted, and that by my predecessor Lalande, which, however, as in that single instance there are neither measures nor other particulars to appear to refer to any of the planets of our system already known. It is for M. Leverrier, that such an observation cannot be received as a scientific fact. It was communicated to the astronomical world in the month of December, 1889.

"The quantity and skill exhibited by M. Lescarbault in securing as complete a record of the transit of the planet as the limited means at his disposal allowed, do him the highest credit, and contribute greatly to add his just claim to the merit of this discovery will never be called in question. It is not a matter of small difficulty to determine the position of an inter-Mercurial planet, but the manner in which, under disadvantageous conditions, he has overcome it, will be appreciated by the friends of science, and that will gain him honourable mention in its history. Que plus d'estimé, ce plus heureux

"To M. Leverrier's marvellous powers as a theoretical and practical astronomer we have long been accustomed to witness that one or more planets must exist within the orbit of Mercury, and it was the publication of his researches on the theory of Mercury's motion that led to the discovery forthwith his experiences on the 26th of March, 1859.

"Before concluding I may observe in general, notwithstanding the best chances of observing the planet may be afforded by its transits over the disc of the sun, it is not to be supposed that only at those times the telescopes of parts of its orbit, provided powerful instruments are employed with minute attention to them, are adjustment, and the proper though not over diminution of the glare of sunlight by dark glasses."

GOVERNOR WEST GONE MAD.—We read in a Canadian letter a report of a speech delivered by Mr. Governor West, which is worthy of notice to some students. Of course he refers to John Brown and the abolitionists. "I am sorry to say that the violence of the outrage has excited a spirit of passion, that I could be forced to strike against the bosom of my own countryman in England, from whom I am proud to spring. But I could try to be relieved. Should that struggle, I would gladly take the alternative of war with England (Applause). We have enough to do with the Southern States (Laughter, and Chancellor Spoliman). Rest. Douglass says he would offer Brigadier-General Brown's son a post in one good war, low, black, wiskis, well-armed steamer in Hampton Roads, I would have placed her on the Newfoundland banks, with orders that she should sink a British packet with that negro on board (A voice: A tremendous applause). And by the eternal gods he should have been hung—(Loud cries of No, no)—(Laughter)—Gentlemen, I claim for myself the privilege of seeing him well hung (Laughter and applause). Then—Sir, Upon the principle that the sentence of death executed upon a murderer of this sentence was lost in the applause.] I hope I would have had that in my power. The violence of the outrage has excited a spirit of [Laughter). If the British Minister had demanded that the murderer of Governor Wise should be delivered up, I should have heard Mr. Seward refer to the question to you (Tremendous applause). I should have said to him, 'Good God, sir, what do you mean? Is this a civilised country? Is it surrendered I will go without a fuss.' I would call, about ten years ago, upon the United States to [Laughter] and England that she should not suffer her Canadian possessions to be used as a place of refuge for the violators of our most sacred laws for our peace." The New York Herald is half disposed to encourage the demand of Governor West in this extraordinary letter. It says:—"In allusions to Canada in the house of refuge for such abolition outlaws, and to the fact that the British provinces to which they escape are cities and southern society, and the Union itself, afford a hint which the next vessel of Mr. Washington Hunt will probably take into consideration. The position which England holds towards us on the slavery question in Canada is not consistent with peace or good will, or good faith to our country. It is the position of a fellow-conspirator with our abolition traitors and incendiaries, and the sooner we bring her to a definite understanding upon this subject the better. Governor Wise calls upon the President 'to notify to the British Government that their asylum of fugitives from labour and from justice (in Canada) shall not be allowed to foster dissensions and disorders in the United States,' and we think that the ventilation of this idea in Congress would really develop the main root of all the existing mischief." The London correspondent of the Herald writes that the affair of Wise is not much afraid. They came across the free once before and had the worst of it. We have grown a trifle since 1813."

VICE-ADMIRAL WATTS, C.B.

VICE-ADMIRAL George Edward Watts, who died at Malvern, on the 2nd inst., in his seventy-sixth year, entered the Royal Navy in November, 1797, and as a midshipman was several times in action. He was made a Lieutenant in 1806, and served in the Walcheren Expedition in 1809. He was Lieutenant of the Comus, 32, in, with one boat and eighteen men, against seventy, cut out the Cygne brig of war, of fourteen guns, under the Batteries, accomplishing the daring act in the face of immense difficulties, and himself received a severe wound and had his arm fractured. For this he received from the Patriotic Fund a sword and a pecuniary reward, and for more than one year was in command of the Comus in the Baltic with gifts conferred on him. In August, 1807, as First Lieutenant, he was engaged with the Danish brigade Overyssel, 44, in the Baltic, which, after an animated encounter, which took place at midnight, surrendered to the Comus. The odds in favour of the enemy were four guns to three and forty to one hundred and forty men against the victors. For his gallantry on this occasion he was promoted Lieutenant into the vacancy made by Commander. While in command of the Spider, Watts was much engaged in the Baltic; and at Riga, with the Russian gunboats and flotilla, and Lord George Stuart, landed at the mouth of the Elbe with all their men, he was left in charge of the boats of the squadron and his force, with seven divers up into a corner of Germany by a French corps d'armée. Watts was actively and efficiently employed in the Baltic in 1854. He obtained post rank in June, 1814. His flag rank bears date September, 1851. In 1857 he was made a Vice-Admiral. He had received the war medal with three clasps, was a Companion of the Bath, a Knight of Hanover, and had other foreign decorations conferred upon him; and in the course of his brave and honourable career had received the thanks of the Admiralty and Parliament. He married above a year since. Vice-Admiral Watts married, first, Jane, daughter of John Wallis, Esq. of Rendersyde Park, by whom (deceased) he had issue. He married, secondly, Elizabeth, daughter of John R. Foulis, Esq., of Heworth, York (by his wife, Lady Elizabeth, Bart.) by whom he leaves four sons and two daughters. Two of the sons are in the Royal Navy.

In the memoir of Captain George Franklin Atkinson, given in this Journal on the 7th inst., the name was misprinted Atkins.

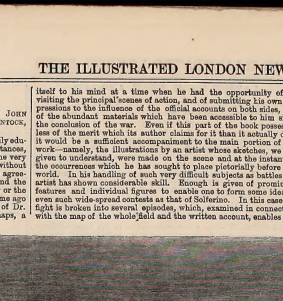
Captain Thackwell had been received into the bosom of the Holy Catholic Church only a short time previous to Sir Joseph's decease.

WARRINGTON MECHANICS' INSTITUTION AND PERAMBULATING LIBRARY.

THE directors of the Mechanics' Institution at Warrington have had a plan in operation for some months which has proved, in every reason to believe, when generally adopted and fully developed, will materially add to the demand for books. Although the Warrington Mechanics' Institution has been in existence for many thirty years, it has been found difficult to raise the circulation of its library to the point which it ought to reach, and these and other means of sending classes to the extent which the directors desired, owing to the difficulty of getting workmen to change their hours and come to the library bar and ask for a book. That difficulty has now been so far overcome that almost 12,000 volumes have been taken from their library shelves during the past year, and a further rise in the circulation is anticipated as the library gets more fully known, and the books more widely distributed. This scheme, which Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli very favourably alluded to at Manchester, recently, when he spoke of "books being taken to every hearth." While the directors are encouraged to hope that the Perambulating Library may continue to pay its expenses, they cannot hope for any profit from it to help out in the purchase of new books. The van, the horse, and the books were all purchased by money raised by the working men of Warrington (£275), and the directors appeal to authors, booksellers, and others to aid them with donations of books or money. Any donation may be sent to the joint chairmen of the Libraries Committees, T. Glazebrook Rylands, Mayor of Warrington, A. Mackie, editor of the Warrington Guardian, at Warrington; or to Mr. Johnson, 121, Fleet-street, London. We give an Engraving of the Perambulating Library.

LITERATURE.

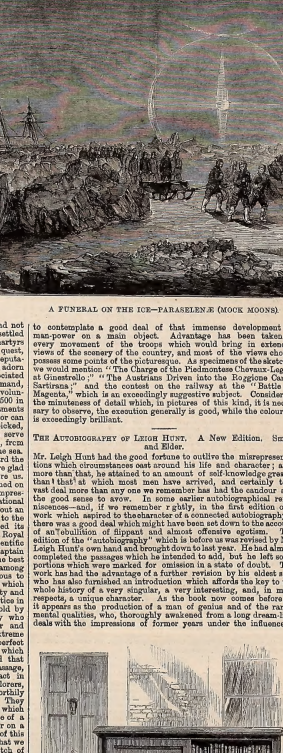


A NARRATIVE OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE FATE OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN AND HIS COMPANIONS. By Captain M'CLINTOCK, R.N., LL.D. Murray.

It has become a truism as regards books to say, that if an ordinarily educated man, of average capacity, placed in the required circumstances, writes down his impressions and describes his experience of the very commonest life, as they occur to his mind and perceptions, without any attempt at literary decoration, he is sure to produce an agreeable, and mostly a valuable, work. Of course the interest and the worth of are narrative is increased in proportion to the novelty or the difficulty in which the narrator has been placed. A short time ago we had a striking instance of this kind in the journal of Dr. Livingstone's adventures in Africa; and now we have, perhaps, a more attractive volume, in the eyes of the nautical as well as personal interest which attaches to the subject, in the diary of Captain M'Clintock. From the preface, which has been written in so sympathising a spirit by Sir Roderick Murchison, we learn that Captain M'Clintock, when he penned his journal and the Arctic icebergs, had no idea whatever of publishing it. Nevertheless, he could hardly have hoped that what it came to be known that he had by him such a record, one which was so likely to fulfil the requirements of the canon of authorship to which we have above alluded, that he would be permitted to hide such a treasure from the world. It is not only with the deepest interest in the subject-matter, but with a personal sympathy for the gallant writer, that we peruse his simple but manly tale of how, in a little vessel of 170 tons burden, he and his well-chosen companions have cleared up the great mystery which hung over the fate of Franklin and his companions. In every respect the book before us tends to confirm the opinion of the leader of the expedition which Lady Franklin formed, and which induced her to ask his services as its commander. If he had not achieved his melancholy but crowning honour of having settled the uncertain question of the ultimate destiny of those martyrs to scientific and geographical research of whom he went in quest, he would have established by the publication of this journal his reputation for the possession of every quality which can belong to and adorn a British sailor and a man. Happy, too, was he in being associated with such coadjutors as Lieutenant Hobson, the second in command, and Captain Allen Young, of the merchant marine, who not only volunteered his personal service in the cause, and subscribed £500 in furtherance of the expedition, but abandoned lucrative appointments in command, and generously accepted a subordinate post. Nor can we withhold our admiration of that small band of seamen, picked, be it understood, from innumerable applicants who offered to serve in any capacity, who poured in from all parts of the country (in fact among people of all classes, many of whom had never seen the sea. It should be noted that the whole number of persons on board the Fox, officers and men all told, was only twenty-five, and we are glad to perceive a list of their names prefixed to the volume before us. Everything which occurred after Lady Franklin had determined on the expedition tended to confirm Captain M'Clintock's own impression that the mission intended to him was in reality a great national duty. The Government, although they had declined to send out an expedition on their own responsibility, contributed liberally to the necessary supplies of the vessel. Every department placed its special supplies at the disposal of the adventurers. The Royal Society voted a sum for the purchase of magnetic and other scientific instruments; and even the different yacht clubs enrolled Captain M'Clintock as a member of their associations, thus paying the best compliment in their power to his selection of a vessel from among their peculiar craft for the expedition. It would be superfluous to enter at length into a consideration or an analysis of a book which speaks for itself; but we are bound to say that the modesty and good humour of the writer has prevented his doing adequate justice in his narrative to his own conduct—conduct which, we are told by those who know the facts, can be estimated by those only who have listened to the testimony of the officers serving under and with a man whose great qualities in moments of extreme peril elicited their heartiest admiration and ensured their perfect confidence.

If, as it is asserted, among other information which has been gained by this enterprise, it has been proved that Franklin was the first real discoverer of the North-West Passage, a deeper interest is added to his history; while the fact in no way detracts from the merit of those subsequent explorers, M'Clure, Collinson, and others, who have been so worthily honoured for working out another North-western Passage. They will add badge to Franklin and his followers the honour for which they died, that of being the first discoverers of the existence of a north-west passage. Expressing a strong inclination to linger on a theme so taking as the abstract interest and the innate charm of this book, we will content ourselves by pointing out in conclusion that we engrave, from one of the illustrations of the volume, a sketch of "A Funeral on the Ice." It represents the interment of one of the only three persons who perished during the expedition—namely, Robert Scott, a stoker and engine-driver, who died, not from the effects of climate or any other cause likely to arise under the circumstances, but from internal injuries from a fall down a hatchway. The scene is touchingly as well as graphically described in the entry in Captain M'Clintock's journal of the date of these melancholy rites.

THE WAR IN ITALY, from Drawings by Carlo Bossoli; with a Descriptive Narrative by the Author of the Times "Letters from the Allied Camp." Day and Son.



This is a brave book, different in subject and spirit altogether from that which we have noticed above, yet has its own interest and its own value. It is a record of glory, in another and more glittering, but, we trust, in not a more enduring form, than that which followed the heroism of the Arctic explorers. The work, as its title indicates, is a descriptive narrative of the war in Italy, the account of which, in its main features, corresponds with the letters which were written on the spot and at the time by the agent of the Times. If there be any variations between the latter and the present narrative it is to be found only in the difference which naturally exists between statements made on the spur of the moment and a revised, considered story produced some time afterwards, when many new details have become known, when much that was doubtful could be cleared up, and when any erroneous impressions which may have been formed could be corrected. Nevertheless, the writer of the chronicle assumes any preferences to notice his own work, but states his work to be a carefully-drawn picture of the campaign as it presented itself to his mind at a time when he had the opportunity of revisiting the principal scenes of action, and of submitting his own impressions to the influence of the official accounts on both sides, and of the abundant materials which have been accessible to him since the conclusion of the war. Even if this part of the book possessed less of the merit which its author claims for it than it actually does it would be a sufficient accompaniment to the main portion of the work—namely, the illustrations by an artist whose abilities we are given to understand, were made on the scene and at the instant of the occurrences which he has sought to place pictorially before the world. In his handling of such very difficult subjects as battles the artist has shown considerable skill. Enough is given of prominent features and individual figures to enable one to form some idea of even such wide-spread contests as that of Solferino. In this case the fight is broken into several episodes, which, examined in connection with the map of the whole field and the written account, enables one to contemplate a good deal of that immense development of man-power on a main object. Advantage has been taken of every movement of the troops which would bring in extended views of the scenery of the country, and most of the views chosen possess some points of the picturesque. As specimens of the sketches we would mention "The Charge of the Piedmontese Chevaux-Legers at Ginestrello." "The Austrians Driven into the Roggione Canal, Sarrinna," and the contest on the railway at the "Battle of Magenta," which is an exceedingly suggestive subject. Considering the minuteness of detail which, in pictures of this kind, it is necessary to observe, the execution generally is good, while the colouring is exceedingly brilliant.

A FUNERAL ON THE ICE—PARASELENÆ (MOCK MOONS).

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LEIGH HUNT. A New Edition. Smith and Elder.

Mr. Leigh Hunt had the good fortune to outlive the misrepresentations which circumstances cast around his life and character; and, more than that, he attained to an amount of self-knowledge greater than that at which most men have arrived, and certainly to a vast deal more than any one we remember has had the candour and the good sense to avow. In some earlier autobiographical reminiscences—and, if we remember rightly, in the first edition of a work which aspired to the character of a connected autobiography—there was a good deal which might have been set down to the account of an affectation of flippant and almost offensive egotism. The edition of the "Autobiography" which is before us was revised by Mr. Leigh Hunt's own hand and brought down to last year. He had almost completed the passages which he intended to add, but he left some portions which were marked for omission in a state of doubt. The work has had the advantage of a further revision by his eldest son, who has also furnished an introduction which affords the key to the whole history of a very singular, a very interesting, and, in most respects, a very pure character. As the book now comes before us it appears as the production of a man of genius and of the rarest mental qualities, who, thoroughly awakened from a long dream of life, deals with the impressions of former years under the influence of practical experience which seems to have sprung full-grown into existence in his mind and feelings. It would seem that the latter days of his life were a realisation of that notion which associates a supernatural clearness of conception in the human mind with the moment before the dissolution of soul and body. The publication of this volume, taken in connection with a most well-informed account of him in the current number of the Cornhill Magazine, will probably place Leigh Hunt in the position he ought to hold in the opinion, and the regard of the world. With just so much given of the characteristics of men who lived more prominently in an age which has passed as is necessary to truth of the picture which it professes to draw, the narrative of which we are speaking is presented to the public in a spirit distinguished by a tone which invests it with the charm of pathos, while it bears testimony to that quality in the writer, for which his son vouches—a sincere if somewhat latent love of truth. In every respect, it carries with it a charm which ought to make the book popular in the higher sense of the term.

THE PECULIUM. By THOMAS HANCOCK. Smith and Elder.

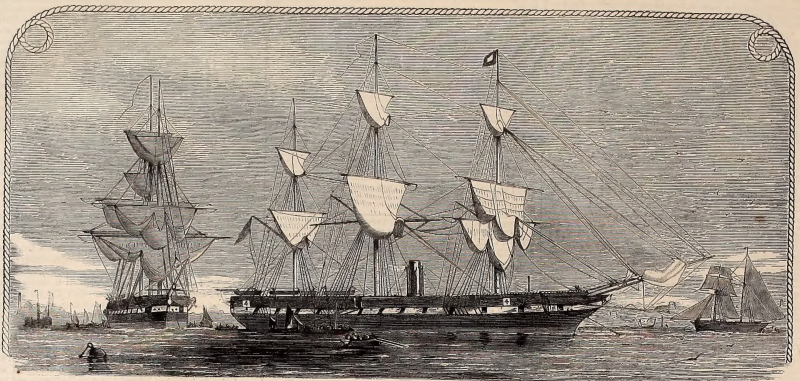
This is stated to be an endeavour to throw light upon some of the causes of the decline of the Society of Friends, popularly called Quakers, especially in regard to its original claim to being the peculiar people of God. It is, in fact, an essay which gained the prize of a hundred guineas which was offered by a gentleman who was anxious to obtain some knowledge of the causes which produced a diminution in the number of the Society of Friends in the last fifty years, notwithstanding that the population of the United Kingdom had more than doubled itself in that time. The gentleman in question lamented this falling off, and the hope probably was that some expedient might be devised by which Quakerism could be arrested. The whole tenour of this essay goes to prove that its preservation is impossible, and the writer's convictions on the subject compel him to reject that such is the case. The author, in the solution of the question might be taken roughly as comprehending the whole argument, as it shows that the present social Quakerism are in direct opposition to each other; that by this opposition they are pledged to an incessant war—a war of the ghostly strength of the seventeenth century against the living strength of the nineteenth, and that in this war Quakerism must lose.

PRE-ADAMITE MAN; or, the Story of Our Old Planet and its Inhabitants told by Scripture and Science. Saunders and Otley.

In his preface the author of this work says "that the idea suggested by this title would, until lately, only have excited a smile of contempt on the part of most readers, some ridiculous absurdities have been written;" may we add, and are continued to be written? Here the writer says that the public have no sympathy with such reasonings as go to affirm the existence of a pre-Adamite race, but he asserts that the subject is unquestionably awaking at present a serious interest, and demands deliberate investigation. The first assertion we may be permitted to deny, and the second we are very much inclined to controvert. Except in the case of a Welsh genealogist, it seems as best doubtful whether mankind can care much for the existence of a mortal race before Adam; and certainly the ground on which the author of this book has founded his theory, and the mode in which he has worked it out, are not calculated to enlist the sympathies of a very large class of readers. The suppositions and inferences which are here made the bases of the argument do not deserve the dignity of the term hold, and if we venture to call them fanciful it is only because we do not wish to be severe. Neither are they calculated to effect an éclaircissement to the undertaking of a subject like that of which this book treats, unless it is dealt with by the hand of a master, and that qualification we have been unable here to detect any traces, and with that expression of opinion we must leave the unsatisfactory task of noticing an unsatisfactory book.

SOME OF MY BUSH FRIENDS IN TASMANIA. By LOUISA ANNE MEREDITH. Day and Son.

Mrs. Meredith's elegant pencil and graceful pen are already known as having been brought to bear upon the beautiful scenery which is in both in the mother country and in her new home in Tasmania, as in "Our Wild Flowers" (English), "Romance of Nature," "Notes and Sketches in New South Wales," &c. In the present volume she devotes herself exclusively to illustrating and describing the native flowers, berries, and insects of Tasmania, of which she presents us with a dozen gorgeous groups, besides straggling specimens running through the margins of the text.



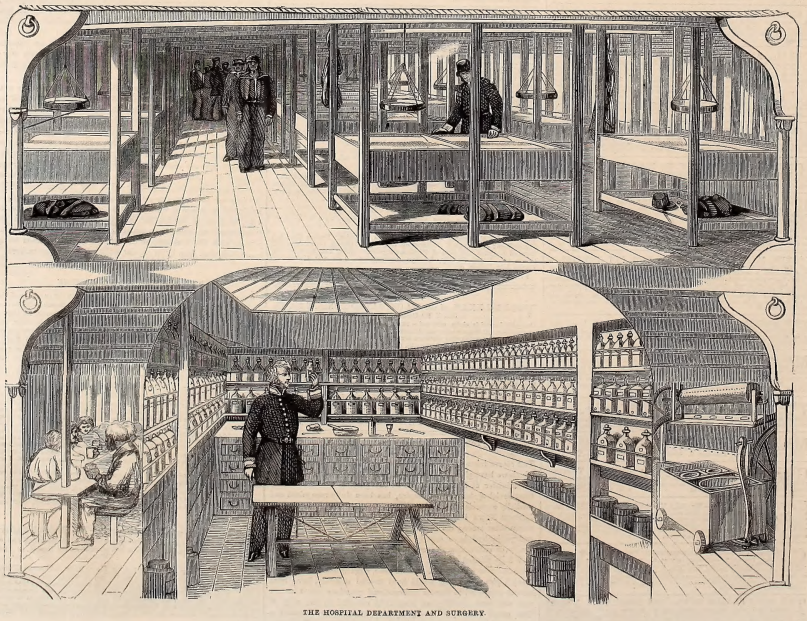
The associations connected with flowers afford some of the most charming ties between former homes and distant friends. In her preface Mrs. Meredith says—

Although the greater part of my Bush Friends are distinctly new to an English eye, a number of well-known old families are found amongst them, whose familiar features have often gladdened me, like glimpses of far-off fair faces, to all appearance identical with the common English one, but possessing a new charm all cleared ground. A pale little violet, the lowliest of her tribe, with delicately-veined, mauve-tinted petals, and a rosy-magenta, often mingling with a small purple crane's bill and a bright yellow oxalis. Our bushes remind us of the Bertha family of every garden, and the potentilla and willow-herb closely resemble those of the Old World; whilst the genera veronica, convolvulus, viola, ranunculus, asperula, labella, convolvulus, myosotis, and others, have representatives in our Australian wilderness.

Whilst, as accurate and beautiful representations of the arboreseous and floral products of an important colony, the engravings in this volume (printed in colours) will prove of great value and interest to the natural historian, the fund of observation and anecdote contained in the accompanying text will recommend it to all readers, and entitle it to take its place beside such works as "White's Natural History of Selborne," "Walton's Angler," and other delightful essays concocted in the bright and varied fields of nature.

This volume, like every respect, most handsomely got up, and is appropriately dedicated, by permission, to her Majesty.

HOSPITAL SHIPS FOR CHINA.



THE MAURITIUS. THE MELBOURNE.

THE Government authorities have been actively engaged for some weeks past in fitting out a large fleet of transports for service in the expedition to China. Besides the Himalaya and a number of other large vessels for the conveyance of troops, ammunition, and stores, two splendid screw steam-ships have been specially equipped and fitted out in the most complete manner as floating hospitals. They are the Melbourne and the Mauritius, each registering over 2000 tons. Two more ships are to be completed in China upon the same plan, and the authorities deserve great credit for the able manner in which all the arrangements on board of these vessels have been carried out. They have been completed under the immediate superintendence of the Director-General of the Army Medical Department and his officers. Our Illustrations represent the two ships off Deptford, and the hospital department and the surgery of the Melbourne; the whole of the orlop-deck is to be used as an hospital. There are beds for one hundred and twenty sick, and twenty for the men of the Medical Staff Corps; each berth is provided with a small round tray, suspended from above, which the patient can pull up and down at pleasure, and also a rope with a handle attached to it, by which he can pull himself up or assist himself in turning. Under each bed is a small rack for his knapsack, clothes, &c. The greatest attention has been paid to the ventilation of this part of the ship. In case of bad weather, when the portholes cannot be opened, a large number of the most improved ventilators communicate with the upper deck all over the vessel.

The surgery is most judiciously placed in the centre of the ship, having a large skylight over it which admits of plenty of light for the surgeons and dispensers of medicines. The top of the skylight is movable, and directly underneath it stands the operating-table; so that wounded men requiring surgical aid may be passed through the opening from the maindeck directly on to it. Attached to the surgery is a wooden box on wheels. This is furnished with various utensils, in different compartments, for the use of the surgeons.

The maindeck of the ship is furnished with every convenience for this particular service. The cabins for the officers are elegantly fitted up. In the forepart of the deck, several wooden erections have been made: some for the accommodation of the men that are well enough to come on deck. One is fitted up with the most approved means for washing and drying clothes, another as a lavatory and bath-room, and another as a bakery: in this is erected one of Stevens's Dough-mixing Machines, by which invalids will be supplied with new bread. Some of the soldiers going out in these vessels have been instructed in the use of the machines. Five surgeons will be attached to each ship, and a number of men of the Medical Staff Corps.

Our description more particularly relates to the arrangements on board the Melbourne. We have also visited the Memphis, and the general arrangements are much the same. Being a larger ship, the space between decks is about eight feet. The cabins are superbly fitted up, and the whole appearance of both ships reflects the highest credit on their captains and officers. The Melbourne sailed on the 13th inst., and the Memphis on the 17th.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1860.

THE course taken by the Emperor of the French in his letter—which we have given in extenso in another part of our Journal—to his Minister of State, by which he inaugurates a new fiscal and commercial system in his empire, has been fully appreciated and cordially appreciated by the English public. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has frequently insisted upon the differences between those among the French journalists who, being uninformed and prejudiced, have eagerly availed themselves of every opportunity of cultivating the misunderstandings that arise between two high-spirited nations like France and England, and the educated and enlightened writers who, condemned to silence on many topics which they would have treated worthily, have been almost compelled to discuss international questions with a certain zeal and even acerbity not absolutely essential to the subject. The grand move just made by the Emperor has afforded a striking illustration of the justice of our distinction. The treatment of the Emperor's letter has been confined to some of the best pens in Paris, and the consequence is that, in lieu of the sneer, scoff, false sentiment, and theatrical jargon with which French and English readers have too often been afflicted when England had to be noticed, the French journalists, generally speaking, address themselves to an all-important theme in a spirit worthy of it. The frankness with which the English press has at once pronounced upon the Emperor's free-trade measures is applauded, and the probable results of these measures are considered with a calmness worthy of superior writers, and singularly in contrast with the style of the frothy journalists to whom large subjects are too often left in Paris, and whose articles are really fitted to deal with little that is more important than the register of an opera-singer's voice, or the episode of his stir in the ballet. We are unexpectedly grateful to find that the fribbles of the coulisses are swept away, for the time, from the French press, to make room for men who understand important questions and discuss them with an honourable gravity.

Lowes, vacated by the death of Mr. Fitzroy, has elected Mr. Blencowe, a Liberal, and another vacancy, through the death of Lord Londesborough, whose son, Mr. Denison, now a Peer, was member for Scarborough. Serjeant Shee announces that he shall not again trouble his present constituents. The other incidents in connection with the representation are that Gravesend and Chelsea have been applying to Ministers urging their respective claims to be represented in Parliament, and that the electors of the Tower Hamlets request a division of their borough into two parts, each having two representatives.

While the Pope is insulting the Emperor of the French, through his Majesty's representative, General Goyon, it is instructive to read in La Patrie that letters from Rome state that his Holiness has resolved to "bolt" from the Eternal City at once, if the slightest intention of withdrawing the French army should be manifested. The Pope's timidity, or old-womanish fear of being put into a rage and scolding his best friends might only excite a smile; but when a King-Priest, from whom truth may reasonably be expected, if from any quarter, gives such painful proof of his cowardice, as well as of his tyranny, as to declare with one breath that he is the best-beloved Sovereign in Europe, and that he dare not trust himself among his subjects unless he is protected by French bayonets, the really sincere Roman Catholic must shudder at the fraud which seems to be inherited with the tiara.

We may notice, but by no means dismiss with a word, the article of an Ultramontane journal that Austria is endeavouring to form a coalition of the Northern Powers, in order to oppose the revolutionary efforts of England and France. Who are to form this coalition? Russia has, perhaps, seen almost enough of England and France in arms to defer any idea of forming a counteraction until she has recovered her strength; Austria is not suppose that Austria is looking to Denmark and Sweden for support; and, when the catalogue is exhausted, what is left to Austria but herself—exhausted likewise, and assuring England that the Cabinet of Vienna has no idea of resuming war? It does not seem improbable that the Powers will retain a sense of the limits of sullenness, and let Italy work out her salvation her own way; but that they will push their ill-humour into action is next to impossible.

Among minor domestic incidents it may be noted that the conviction of several members of the strike has been confirmed on appeal, and that they have been sent to prison, as a hint to the violent that they cannot be permitted to carry their enforcement of unsound political doctrine to the point of personal intimidation;—that the masters have signed an agreement binding them to arbitrate, and England has been once more proved by the escape of some scoundrels who are shown to have committed barbarous murders on board the American vessel Anna, but who, claimed by their Consul, have been set at liberty—that the new Westminster-bridge is ready for passengers, as regards half its length; but there is said to be no power of opening it in the absence of an official to take the place of the late Mr. Fitzroy;—and that the wretched "Indicator" at Hyde Park-corner is to be demolished, in compliance with the demand of those who object to London being more disfigured than by its regular architects and statue-makers.

LORD MACAULAY'S "HISTORY OF ENGLAND."—As great public interest has been expressed respecting the continuation of Lord Macaulay's "History of England," and some misstatements have gone forth, we feel it desirable to announce, on the best authority, that no progress has been made by Lord Macaulay towards the completion of another volume, and that a portion of the MS. is fully prepared for publication. For instance, however, it will probably be only for some time the appearance of a further portion of the history.—Times.

The case lasted nearly all the day. For the appellants it was urged that they had been acting within their powers by the Legislature, but the Court was of a different opinion, unanimously confirming the decision of the magistrate. The appeal was consequently dismissed with costs.

An inquest was held at Stepney, last Saturday, on the body of EDWARD HOLLOWAY, a labourer, aged 70. Mr. Macpherson, the coroner, said many years he had lived alone in the house, which was in a dilapidated condition. The deceased was found in the wretched state. It appeared that the neighbours became alarmed at not seeing the deceased, and when the door was forced open he was found lying on the floor dead, and life had been extinct several days. The deceased had money in the bank; and some years ago he had been found in the wretched apartment. Verdict, "Died from starvation."

In the week ending with Saturday, January 17, the last week of the year, rose to 1044 in the week that called last Saturday. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the week corresponding to last week was 1218. Nine nonagenarians, of whom the two oldest were 95 and 96 years of age, died in the week. This circumstance would have to be taken into consideration by the Ministry when they came before the country. Mr. Rogers (the secretary) read the report of the committee, from which it appeared that 3,000 persons had been registered during the year, and that there was a balance in the funds of £3543 13s. 8d.

ELECTION AUDITORS' FEES.—At the last Monmouth county election, Mr. Wintour, acting as solicitor, was employed by the agents of the electors as a candidate, but was withdrawn by his own consent before the day of the parade, leaving Mr. Somerset Beaufort and Lieut.-Colonel Probert Somerset was elected member; and under these circumstances Mr. Wintourer demurred to paying the £10 fee to the election auditor, on the ground that he gave him no trouble, and the auditor referred him no service. The case was argued before Baron Martin in the Exchequer Court on Monday. On the one hand it was contended that the Act of Parliament intended to tax the candidate for services rendered by the auditor to the public, and that, therefore, every candidate, whether he went to the poll or not, was bound to pay; on the other it was urged that the evident intention of the Legislature was to diminish the expense of election, and not to increase it, and therefore, as in the present case, the Court, however, were unanimously of opinion that every candidate was liable, and judgment was given accordingly in favour of the auditor.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."—At the adjourned meeting of the shareholders in the Great Ship Company the resolution for a committee of investigation moved at the last meeting as an amendment to the reception of the report was announced to have been negatived by a majority of 4919 votes to 3971. GENERAL BEATSON, formerly of the Bashi Bazouks, and now in command of "Beatson's Horse" in the Khelat Expedition, has brought a number of Horse, now British Consul at Aleppo, for slander. The slander alleged was a statement by Mr. Forbes that when the General was during the Crimean war, been superseded in the command of the irregular cavalry by General Beatson, he had amassed the commanding officers of regiments and had endeavoured to persuade them to mutiny against General Smith and General Vivian, on which Mr. Forbes called Lieutenant-Colonel O'Reilly and Shelly, left the room; and further, that the General had caused a sound to be made in the ears of the soldiers at night, hoping that they would get refusing to serve under any other General but himself; but in that he had failed to obtain any support. The case was next tried in the Court of Exchequer on Friday and Saturday last, and terminated in a verdict for the defendant, Mr. Forbes, and that the words spoken by Mr. Forbes were "privileged communication," but the jury expressed an opinion that on discovery" how unfounded" the report against General Beatson was he ought to have withdrawn his statements.

ST. JAMES'S HALL: PHILHARMONIC AND MUSICAL SICK FUND ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday afternoon a numerously-attended general public meeting of the subscribers, donors, and members of the above benevolent institution was held in the saloon of the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, for the purpose of receiving the report and accounts passed in general committee on Tuesday, Dec. 30, 1879, and for a grant of £200 to build one house for the Royal Dramatic College. In addition to sanction and confirm the special committee on the same day for a grant of £250 to form the nucleus of a building fund for the erection of a new house of this association, in lieu of the present institution, occupied the chair. The Chairman, in proposing the adoption of the resolution of the committee of the 30th ult., said that when the Drury Lane Fund had built two houses, the Covent Garden Fund had built the Beethoven Fund, and that, if the meeting voted in favour of the proposed, eight houses would be paid for, and the fund itself would only have to build two. The 25th Rule of their original Trust Deed was carried unanimously. Mr. Phillips then proposed that the meeting should proceed to audit and confirm the accounts of the existing superannuation fund, and stated that the finances of the institution were very low and healthy. The motion was seconded by Mr. Amson (the secretary) stated that Mr. Tidd Pratt had kindly undertaken to prepare the deed of trust for the new fund. The motion was carried. The accounts to grant sums of 5s., 7s. 6d., and 10s. per week, to the number of 30, to the parents of the age of 70 and upwards, but it was intended to interfere with any other fund, the sole object of the committee being to relieve distress. Mr. Phillips was then called upon to take the chair, and, after thanking them put, and carried unanimously.

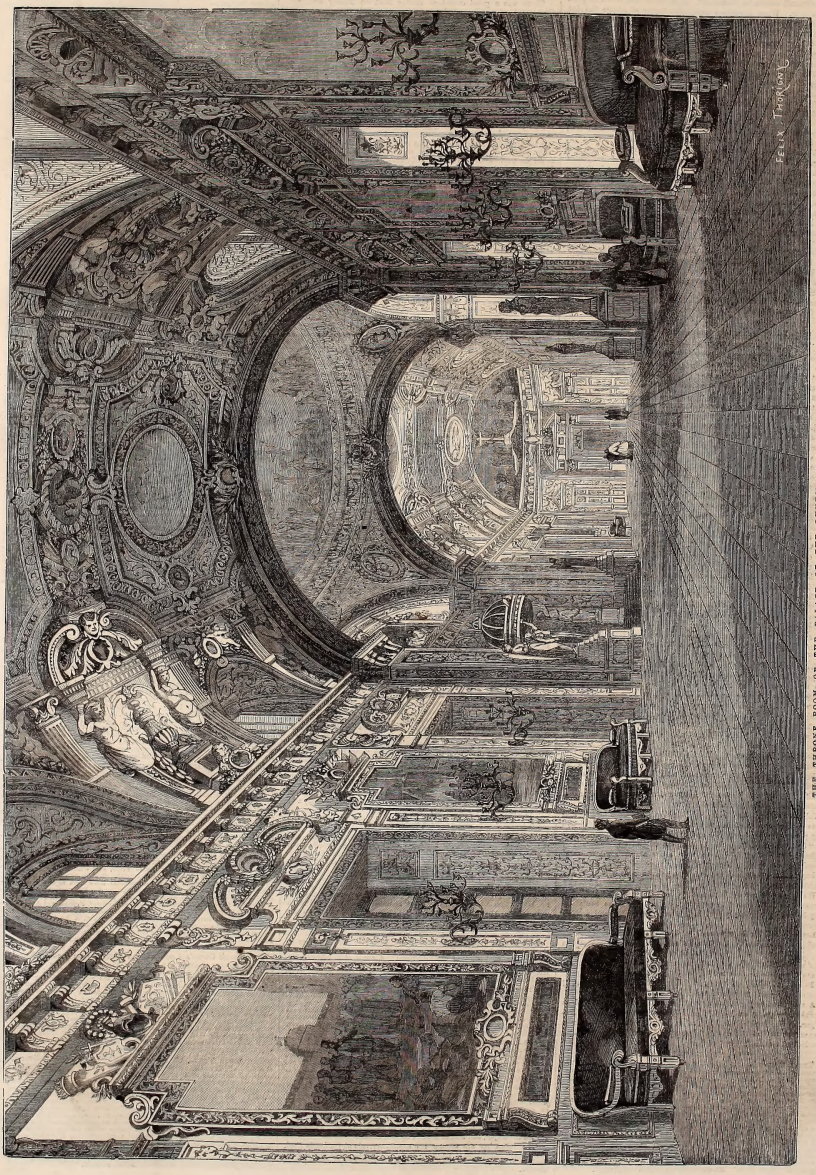
GRAND OPENING OF THE VICTORIA BRIDGE.—The idea of a Grand Provincial Exhibition has been very happily suggested on the Corporation of the Victoria Bridge, Montreal, and the arrangements with of one of the Royal Princes. The occasion will attract thousands of visitors from abroad, and a Prince of the House of Hohenzollern will be present and the country of Canada than a provincial exhibition on a large scale—Times.

DISTURBANCES IN COPENHAGEN.—Copenhagen letters of the 11th state that distinctions continue to prevail in that capital. On the previous day disorderly crowds had collected and made noisy demonstrations in several streets. When dispersed by the police they spread about the city shouting as before. A considerable number of persons had been arrested. The Dagbladet urges all citizens to keep quiet, and to aid in preventing the repetition of these disorderly scenes. According to the same journal, the disorders have seriously injured the cause with those victorious proceedings, for the scrutinizers were first formed under the pretext of preventing the arrest of the editor of the Dagbladet (Torck or Trick). The most furious shouting, too, always takes place in front of the police.



SLAVERY AS IT IS.—At the April term, 1859, of the Circuit Court for Cecil County, Maryland, a negro man, aged about 30 years of age, named John Scott, was tried for grand-jury of the State and returning the verdict, guilty of the offence. He was sentenced by the Court to pay a fine of twenty dollars and costs of suit; and, in default thereof, to be sold as a slave. Not having paid the fine and costs, the negro was duly sold as a slave, at a public sale, to the highest bidder, for 875 dollars. He was sold as a slave for life, and is now on this on his way to the southern market. The purchaser was a man named Fairbank, from Baltimore. The New York Tribune says that the case excites universal ire:—"Does a more unjust and iniquitous law than the one under which this negro was sold into a life-long bondage disgrace the statute-books of any other country?"

ELECTRO-MAGNETISM APPLIED TO WEAVING.—An improvement in weaving machinery, the invention of a French engineer, named Bonelli, has been introduced by a M. Bonelli, who has made use of a simple electro-magnetic apparatus to produce the movements of the shuttle invented by Jacquard, in a way the principle of which will be at once guessed by those acquainted with the use of the electric telegraph. The object of Bonelli's invention is to dispense with the use of pasteboard cards, the holes in which some of the wires or small rods, which, when pressed down by the cards, are allowed to slip and thus raise these threads, while the others are opposed by the solid parts of the cards. In the new invention the design is made in black varnish on the tinfoil paper is placed in the hand as an endless band over a roller. A row of fine wires is placed above the paper, and when these points the patterns in an horizontal line right across it. These touching the varnish remain insulated, but those that touch the tinfoil are put in connection with the tinfoil of the pattern. The electric current passes through the wire, and, passing through the coil of wire, and with it, which sends on the bare surface of the tin. The black varnish of the pattern is thus left, and the current prevents the electricity from passing into any of the brass plates touching the varnished portion of the tinfoil. Now, the electric current is made to pass through a coil of wire, which is made to magnetize a little iron rod. The magnetized rod attracts another rod, and, by the aid of mechanism, the corresponding thread of the warp is elevated.

LETTER-DIVING IN THE PARIS POST OFFICE.—The Paris correspondent of the Times says:—"Mr. Pothier, formerly a letter-bag organisation going on in the more secret branch of the Paris Post Office—the pourtoir, where suspected letters are opened. Another organisation, not at present known, but which is certain that a blunder now and then occurs which would indicate the existence of a secret organisation. Another well-known and respectably posted in London last month a letter, addressed to an advertiser friend in Paris. He put it in the box at the corner and duly received it. The letter was then put and carried, stating that my informant—a gentleman who had been long employed in the Paris Post Office—had seen a wrong enclosure into the envelope. 'M.' saw that the seal had not been broken, but that the letter had been enclosed in a wrong envelope, addressed to it a small portion of delicate pink-coloured paper, which had been used to wrap up a letter. Some days after, a Parisian friend, to him unknown, written to a lady in Paris (also unknown to him), who had just come to London, and who had left her address with a number of some articles of millinery. M., surrounded himself, did not like the idea of such a transaction, and, in accordance with letters of the Post Office, but wrote back to, suggesting that he might have made a mistake, and might know either the lady or the address to which the letter was addressed. To reflect that he knew nothing of either, and that the whole letter was a transaction of the kind which he had been coming of letters in the French Post Office. The next step taken was to write to the lady in London, to inform her how her letter and draft had got into the hands of M. This procured M. a visit from a gentleman connected with a respectable firm of high standing in the City, who observed that the lady's letter and draft had been duly posted by one of their clerks, and that the two inclosures were in an envelope with a black border. M.'s original letter to T. was also in an envelope with a black border; and this led to the supposition, well or ill founded, that the parties who on that particular day had such little regard for private correspondence found out two letters with black borders, and, having already read the first unfortunately, opened and read them both, they committed the blunder of placing the wrong inclosure in the wrong envelope. M.'s letter to T. has not yet been discovered.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

BROUGHAM'S advice to Macaulay! Well, of course, there is good sense in it. When Brougham wrote this letter of advice the lad Macaulay was a boy of twenty-three. Brougham—fresh from crush-ing the Cambridge scholar; but he did not foresee that he should outlive the thoughtful headed boy whom Lord Grey had condescended to commend. Macaulay, dead, and Brougham alive! It is sad, even in literary circles. "Would not Macaulay have written a better letter of advice to Brougham than Brougham wrote to Macaulay's father?" But we must take it as it is; and Brougham's himself might have written Brougham's letter and sent it to the father of ard Sacon.

The old curiosity shops are going into mourning. January 1860, as proved a dull month—and hardly yet half through—with men who deal "in books for Mead and butterflies for Sloane." Only last week we chronicled, with regret, the death of Lord Hastings and the probable termination of the Maltese Consulate collection. This week we have to chronicle the death of Lord Londesborough—better known as Lord Albert Conyngham—whose love for antiquities really worth preserving was only to be exceeded by the liberality of his purse in endeavouring to secure them. Little collectors and we have a chance of securing whatever may turn up at cheaper prices; but England has lost in Lord Hastings and Lord Lon desborough something like what England lost in Lord Orford and Sir Hans Sloane.

The monument of Robert Stephenson in Westminster Abbey will be a wishing for Wales, of Scotland, and the rich widow, that will half exclude and half shut the light, will throw much prey on a northern and religious light on the grave of the great engineer.

Mr. Henry Cole, C.B., who has a right to be heard on any question connected with Hampton Court, that real palace of the past Kings and Queens of England, has just put forth a little pamphlet touching certain alterations that, in his opinion, should be made at once at Hampton Court. In much that Mr. Cole urges he has our hearty concurrence. But—critics must object—we do not like his proposed committee. Hampton Court is a little scrange of associations, and the men to deal with Hampton Court must be men of the first mark, not in person or palate, but the men who know the place from still renewing love and continually renewing associations. We shall return to this subject when Parliament meets.

> Where, thou great Anna, whom three realms obey,
> Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes—tea,

Passing along Piccadilly the other day to leave a card at Lord Palmerston's, and another card for Mr. Albert Smith, we were met by a sickly smile, which, in its way, was quaint and expressive manner, that we should put a book in to our pocket. This scholar's taste we knew to be good; so we consented. "Of the writer," he observed, "I know nothing. Read the book," he continued; "I have read it." We recommended him to read it also, and we left Mudie. We took the book, and, though a new work, it was well thumbed (not from Tom's fingers), but a book evidently to be liked. What, you will ask, evidently, and why? Well, we will tell you, and the author! We can answer at once. The book is called "Old Leaves from Household Words." The author is Mr. W. H. Wills. We can observe, as Mr. Wills touchingly admits, another hand here and there in the pages, and this is not the hand of Charles Dickens, nor is it the worse for it. Mr. Wills has in himself alone given the world a good book.

We are sorry our links with the past. Some few years back of subscription was raised, and raised at once, for the god-daughter of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., author of the "Dictionary of the English Language," a book done in depression and a garret. This week's news announces the death of the daughter of Macaulay's friend, Johnson's god-daughter; and we, in common with Mr. Carlyle and many others, shed a tear upon her grave.

What is Sir George Cornewall Lewis about, who in every other respect does his work well, in suffering ignorant people to new name the streets of London? We are to lose Southampton-street, Russell-square; it is to be called Cosmo-place, in compliment to a Russell. What's in a Cosmo? Surely a Russell is as good. We regret the change historically. Macaulay would have regretted the change. Walter Scott would have regretted the change.

Our readers are entitled to attention to the rotten nature of the stone which forms the facing of the St. James's Park front of Buckingham Palace, our "palace in Pimlico." This little anecdote we can relate connected with it. The choice of the stone was no fault of Sir Benjamin Hall's; the latitude killed Colonel Reid, and Cubitt died worth three millions of money, and well-earned money. Cubitt, after a life of honest and successful industry, was led into a mistake, and he bitterly remembered it.

Talk of binding books! Here, only the other day, Mr. Toovey—who loves leather and prunella—was induced to give one hundred and fifty pounds for an Aldus, rich and refulgent and yet quiet, through the "Grolier work." That the book was worth its money we can fully believe; but Rothschild's purse, with books at such prices, could afford only a very small library. Mudie, it is clear, could not afford to buy books at one hundred and fifty pounds a piece for cart and country or even town circulation.

We rejoice to see that there is to be a monument "testifying respect" to Mountstuart Elphinstone. Lord Stanhope leads the way in making this very proper memorial a commercial and artistic success.

But one opinion is expressed touching the election of Mr. C. R. Cockerell to succeed Cockerell by the Royal Academicians of the Royal Institute of Architects, vacant by the death of Earl De Grey. And what is that opinion? That the election of Mr. Cockerell was in every way a wise election.

Did Miss Nightingale really write her own "Notes on Nursing"? Doctors disagree. Did Garth write his own "Dispensary"?

A new fact has just come to light. Sir John Franklin served as signal-midshipman on board the Leviathan at the battle of Trafalgar. Geographical enthusiasm is consequently demanding a monument to Franklin in Trafalgar-square. Let us first complete our Nelson monument, and wipe away a national disgrace.

THE BELFAST BLACK LIST.—A point of considerable interest to commercial men has been discussed in the Dublin Court of Queen's Bench. Some time ago Miss Trevedale brought an action against Mr. Stewart, of Belfast, for breach of promise of marriage, and the jury awarded the lady £500 damages. Mr. Stewart, on Saturday, applied to be allowed to pay this sum into court, and to give security for the payment of costs when taxed, without a judgment being entered against him—the motive being a wish to obviate the prejudice which might be raised against him as a merchant from having his name posted in the Belfast "Black List," a publication in which are entered the names of all parties against whom judgments have been recorded in the law courts. The Chief Justice warmly denounced this of the kind mentioned, as "calculated to unjustly injure the reputation of many persons in the mercantile world," and intimated that steps would be taken to prevent strangers from searching the records of the Court of Queen's Bench for the purpose of obtaining such information as usually appears in "Black Lists." Mr. Stewart's application was granted.

MUSIC.

There was a great crowd at Exeter Hall on Friday evening (last week), when "Samson" was performed. This oratorio, though it is undoubtedly one of the greatest of Handel's works, has never, from the composer's own time to the present, gained the popularity to which its grandeur and beauty entitle it. Even now, though occasionally performed at Exeter Hall, it has never become what is called a favourite. It is difficult to account for this; though it may, perhaps, be attributed to the faults of the poem, which, though founded on the "Samson Agonistes," is disfigured by the baser matter introduced into it by the literary hack whom Handel employed, who has inserted his rubbishy air Milton with a great deal of mean and vulgar language, and has, moreover, rendered the most sublime and incoherent. Handel, nevertheless, has put forth his utmost powers in this work. The Philistian dances and choruses exhibit rival those of "The Messiah" itself. There is another remarkable feature in the composition of "Samson." We mean the rapidity with which it was written. Like "The Messiah," it was begun and finished in less than a month; and in both works the instrumental score is, consequently, more meagre than in Handel's other oratorios, as all the world knows, is in "The Messiah" completely supplied by Mozart; and our excellent musical friend, Costa, has done a similar service to "Samson." His additional accompaniments are most masterly, and, without in the slightest degree altering the composer's design, greatly enhanced the richness and beauty of the harmony. The performance of Friday week was one of the best ever given by the Sacred Harmonic Society. Miss Dolby, who undertook the music of Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Belletti. It was, we believe, Miss Dolby's first appearance at this work. Her voice was scarcely powerful enough for so vast a space, but she sung beautifully nevertheless, and delighted the audience by her pure, refined, and expressive performance. Of the others it is sufficient to say that they maintained their high reputation.

There was a very excellent performance on Wednesday evening last, at St. Martin's Hall, when "The Creation" was given, under the direction of Mr. Hullah. "The solo singers were Madame Clemens Doring, Miss Dolby, Miss Gray, Mr. Lawler, and Mr. Weiss. It was Miss Gray's first appearance in public. She is a pupil of Miss Rainforth, from whom she has evidently received her English musical stage, and promises to do honour to her accomplished and talented instructors. She is young, and exceedingly pleasing in looks and manner, has a pure, sweet voice, and sings with much taste, judgment and feeling. She sang the beautiful music belonging to the part of Eve, and, on the whole, acquitted herself in a highly creditable manner. The hall was full, literally, to overflowing; and the audience greeted the delight they received from Haydn's masterpiece—the most delightful of all the oratorios—with enthusiasm. Mr. Hullah had all the applause bestowed on all the principal airs, duets, and choruses.

The Monday Popular Concerts are going on with undiminished success. At each concert St. James's Hall is filled to the doors, and the frequent repetitions of the same pieces, however, are received with every mark of enthusiasm. The concert of Monday last was a specimen of the most sumptuous kind. The vocal pieces were selected entirely from Handel's oratorios, several of whose finest songs were beautifully sung by Madame Lemmens Sherrington. In the first part Mozart's quartet in E flat was given, the entertainment was miscellaneous. It included Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, in which the executants, played by Messrs. Becker, Ries, Doyle, and Piatti; Mozart's sonata in A for piano and violin, played by M. Hallé and M. Becker; and Dussek's quartet in F minor for piano, violin, tenor, and violoncello. Mr. Doyle, the first of his instrument being excellently played by Mr. Carter.

The vocal and instrumental party now on a tour in the provinces, consisting of Madame Endersohn, Miss Wells, M. Deprez, and Mr. Paby, Mdlle. Hennicke the youthful violinist, and Monsieur Berger, are meeting with extraordinary success. The concert where they appeared last week at Derby was one of the best and most successful that we have heard of in the provinces for a long time. The musical town; the audience crowding the very platforms, doors, and passages, while numbers went away unable to obtain places.

THE THATRES, &c.

STRAND.—A new piece by Messrs. A. Mayhew and Sutherland Edwards was produced on Saturday last, entitled "The Ultra Crepidarians." The selection of subject and treatment are both eccentric, to say the least, and worked out in any shape that happens, without regard to probability or moral consistency. Thus, for instance, here are two husbands made to act the part of somebody simply for the purpose of enabling them to shock a stingy reformatuce to conform to the custom of Christmas boxes. The wives on this occasion are the expected recipients, and the husbands the donors, and the latter endeavour to get up a matrimonial squabble as an excuse for not making the necessary presents. Detected in this, they endeavour to make amends for their error by a present, and detected at the moment of declaration; but, as the ladies overhear the plot, the surprising turn is anticipated, and Mr. Rogers and Mr. Emden are subject to a counterplot, which converts their feigned attachment into a real passion, and induces their shabby partners to make such a Christmas present as will "make the fortune of the piece." In such a situation is monstrous, and not redeemable even by the clever acting of Miss Reynolds and Miss Oliver. The latter lady plays the merry wives, or the irascible humour of Miss Lavine as an indignant housemaid. Her force, however, has the merit of originality, and was not unfavourably received.

ST. JAMES'.—A wild affair, a mixture of burlesque and ballet, was produced on Saturday evening, entitled "My Name is Norval." The ballet part was exquisitely carried out by Miss Lydia Thompson, who performs the part of Norval, the jealous Randolph being vociferously reported by Mr. Charles Young, whose Scotch comic-singing songs abound. The extravaganza has a framework. It is assumed that some shopmen in Regent-street have engaged a private theatre for Boxing Day, and, with the assent of their employer, Mr. Peter Wooley (Mr. Barrett), who presides over the revels with a mock dignity which is the best of the fun, they proceed to perform, not an adaptation of the tragedy of "Douglas," accompanied with dancing and singing. The result is a burlesque very funny in the extreme, and was well accepted by a numerous audience.

It is intended to erect a theatre for dramatic performances in the Turkish quarter of Galata, which is to be under the direction of the most central locality of Constantinople. A corps of managers, play-wrights, and performers is to be formed for the native drama. The company, will be brought from Europe, and the whole establishment will be organised on the model of European theatres.

HEDGERLEY PARK.—PRIVATE THEATRICALS.—On Thursday and Friday last, the 19th and 20th inst., the annual private dramatic entertainments, was got up at Hedgerley Park, the seat of R. B. Kyrle, Esq. The performances took place in the saloon of the mansion, to a numerous audience. Captain Clayton, late 18th Light Dragoons, and Mr. J. Simpson undertook the duties of stage-manager. Secret Service was the piece. An address written and spoken by the host was delivered.

The Journal du Havre says:—"Mr. Price, who at the Cirque, it may be remembered, was killed while on a wire, was standing on a ladder placed perpendicularly on a platform, and which he at the same time made to move about, has just met with a fatal accident in one of the cities in the centre of France. By a false movement he fell from the ladder and was killed on the spot."

On the night of the 5th of September, on the occasion of some disturbance in the theatre of Port Louis, Mauritius, the Mayor ordered water to be pumped upon the audience. The inhabitants subsequently held an indignation meeting and memorialised the Governor on the subject. While His Excellency perused the narrative of the catastrophe "with much pain," and "expressed his regrets at the occurrence of the insult at which they were so justly indignant," he reminds them that they themselves elected the Mayor, and that he is not a colonial official.

The following are among the recent arrivals at Ostlands Park Hotel:—The Right Hon. E. Cardwell, M.P., and Mrs. Cardwell, Rev. J. Ball, Rev. Hen. Godfrey Guthrie and Mrs. Guthrie, and Comte de Hamilton, from Sweden.

HOW TO BECOME AN ORATOR.

The following is a copy of a letter of Lord Brougham, first printed by Professor Selwyn :—

TO ZACHY. MACAULAY, ESQ.

Newcastle, March 10, 1823.

My Dear Friend,—My principal object in writing to you to-day is to offer you some suggestions, in consequence of some conversation I have just had with Lord Grey, who has spoken of your son (at Cambridge) in terms of the greatest praise.

What I wish to inculcate especially, with a view to the great talent for public speaking which your son evidently possesses, is that he should cultivate that talent in the manner in which it can reach the height of the art; and I would have him to aim at the highest. To speak upon this subject with the study in theory; have written a great deal upon it; I have made it very much my light; and something which has been published; have meditated much, and conversed much on it with famous men; have had many pupils, and practised myself in it, and have prepared for much more than I ever tried, by a variety of laborious compositions, from the most elaborate oration, composing in Parliament language, &c.; and I have lived in times when there was great room for display. Therefore I reckon my opinions upon this subject should have saved a world of labour to me and much time had I started with a conviction of its value.

1. The first point is this: the beginning of the art is to acquire a habit of easy speaking; and in whatever way this can be best (which individual inclination or accident will generally point out), and easy ability be allowed to do so) it must be attained. Now, I differ from all other doctors of rhetoric in this: I say let him first of all acquire this habit as easily and fluently; as well as easily as he can no doubt, but at any rate let him learn to speak. This is the great object. This is the great point. It must be able to talk in a child into correct grammatical speech. It is the requisite foundation, and on it you must build. Let the habit once be acquired young; therefore let it by all means, and at any sacrifice, be acquired before the time for finishing or acquiring it every way severely even will also be acquired. It must be got by a habit of easy speaking; and whatever way this habit will proceed least will be the best way to attain it. Some will improve (or at least something at any rate, by copying Windham's best, and very few, or rather none, of Sheridan's; but he must by no means stop there. He must go to the ancients, he must go to the source, to the fountain head, and be familiar with every one of the great orations of Demosthenes and Cicero. I take for granted that he knows those of Cicero; they are very beautiful, but not very useful, except perhaps the "Milo, pro Ligario," and some few others. But he must read and study them as a model; and merely reading it, as boys do, to know the language, won't do at all; he must attend rather less to the words than to the thoughts and the positions of the parties, follow each turn of the argument, and mark the absolutely perfect manner in which every one is constructed, and stamp it on his mind. His taste will improve every time he reads and repeats to himself any one of those orations, and he will catch the true spirit of it; much may be done by a skilful use of a few words and a rigorous rejection of all superfluities. As to which of the two orators he ought to be most set to work on, I prefer Demosthenes. It is in vain to say that imitations of those models won't do for modern times. I take for granted that he knows those of Cicero; they are very beautiful, but not very useful, except perhaps the "Milo, pro Ligario," and some few others. But he must read and study them as a model; and merely reading it, as boys do, to know the language, won't do at all; he must attend rather less to the words than to the thoughts and the positions of the parties, follow each turn of the argument, and mark the absolutely perfect manner in which every one is constructed, and stamp it on his mind. His taste will improve every time he reads and repeats to himself any one of those orations, and he will catch the true spirit of it; much may be done by a skilful use of a few words and a rigorous rejection of all superfluities. As to which of the two orators he ought to be most set to work on, I prefer Demosthenes. It is in vain to say that imitations of those models won't do for modern times. I take for granted that he knows those of Cicero; they are as imitable of the same spirit. Secondly, I know from experience that nothing is half so useful in learning to speak well as to read over by rote what has been formed on the Greek models.

In giving your own opinions, I use a very poor instance in the courts of law and Parliament, and even to mobs, I have never made much play (to use a vulgar phrase) of what I had got by heart, or learning from the Greek. I composed the peroration of my speech for the Queen, by the London, after reading and repeating Demosthenes for a whole year weeks, and I composed it twenty times over at least, and it certainly succeeded in a very extraordinary degree, and far above any merits of its own. This leads me to remark that, though speaking, with writing before you, is very well until the habit of speaking be acquired, yet after that it can never write too much; this is quite clear. It is laborious, and that and it is more difficult to write than to speak; but it is necessary, and; but it is necessary to perfect oratory, and at any rate it is necessary to acquire the habit of correct diction. Now, I am speaking of the case of a man's life he must prepare word for word most of his finer passages. Now, would be be a great orator if he did not? Pitt and Fox have a most obvious power of being good to vanishing in a free country or no? So be willing to read this, he must follow these rules:

Believe me truly yours,

H. BROUGHAM.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

A NEW ELECTRIC PILE has been devised by M. Marié Davy, and described by him in a note to the French Academy recently, which appears in L'Institut.

THE ACCLIMATISATION OF ANIMALS (which we have frequently brought under the notice of our readers) is the subject of a very valuable article by a member of the Edinburgh Review (just out). The Imperial society for the purpose of introducing new breeds of animals into the public metropolis, M. Geoffroy St. Hilaire, in 1854. The reviewer, in his remarks, does not underrate the labours of the society, but points out the French zoologists, not only in increasing the fauna of their own countries, but in transporting the most valuable animals from the Old World, Australia, &c. to the New. In short, that he derived much of his information from the celebrated "Museum d'Histoire Naturelle" at the Jardin des Plantes of London. The article is enlivened with amusing anecdotes.

M. HIPPOLYTE FIZEAU, the distinguished physicist, for his researches in the sciences relating to heat, light, and electricity, has been elected a member of the French Academy of Sciences, in the room of the late Captain Sabine, who died last spring. The votes at the last scrutiny were 30 for M. Fizeau, 24 for M. Delafosse, and one for each of Sir W. Hamilton and Faraday. The honour to which M. Fizeau has attained is considered to be one of the greatest that any scientific man in Europe can aspire to. He is related to the illustrious family De Jussieu. In the last number of the Annales de Chimie is a paper by M. Fizeau, containing a description of a most ingenious ether, with an account of an experiment which appears to demonstrate that the velocity of bodies alters the rapidity with which light is propagated in their interior.

METALS IN SEAWATER.—The presence of silver in seawater has been affirmed by Malaguti, Durocher, and Sarzeau, and has since been confirmed by the recent researches of Field, and others. Mr. Tuld, an American, calculates that the Atlantic Ocean contains 1,000 million tons of silver in its composition. The experiments have been repeated by M. Bobierre, who has found silver diffused in the waters of the estuary and sterilising of Dutch vessels sailing to India. He reckons that in the course of six years the Atlantic Ocean contains 1,000 million tons of silver. Its presence acquires from the sea nine tons of pure silver. As the copper is dissolved in proportion as the silver is deposited, it follows that the Atlantic Ocean has conjectured that copper also would be found in seawater; he accordingly analysed the incrustations on the sides of a bronze vessel sunk near Marseilles and Corsica, a bog containing salts and iron filings, which were copper, and several vegetables.

PROFESSOR OWEN'S LECTURES ON FOSSIL BIRDS, at the Royal Institution, were resumed on Tuesday evening. The professor first recovered his voice, delivered a most interesting discourse, full of incident, and as usual very entertaining and instructive. He showed the great appearance of the traces of birds in the strata of England and France; then described, in a most graphic manner, the birds of the present day, dilated in every part of the structure of the bird; and, lastly, dwelt especially upon the gigantic birds of New Zealand—the Dinornis, the Palapteryx, and the wingless bird of New Zealand—the Dinornis, the first bone of which was brought to Professor Owen from Wellington by Mr. Walter Mantell, whose name were afterwards sent to England by Mr. Mantell, the son of the distinguished geologist, Dr. G. A. Mantell. On Tuesday Professor Owen will dwell upon the consideration of Fossil Reptiles, many representations of which appear in the grounds of Crystal Palace.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL'S FIRST LECTURE ON LIGHT was delivered at the Royal Institution on Thursday, the 19th. By the aid of the electric light he described, in a most lucid manner, the theory of undulation; demonstrated that light is propagated in straight lines; that it is reflected from smooth surfaces (in the same manner as an elastic ball), the angle of incidence being equal to the angle of reflection; that when a beam falls upon a transparent body it divides into two, one of which is reflected and the other transmitted; that at every change of medium light is reduced; that when the incidence is perpendicular the beam is straight—when the incidence is oblique the beam is bent at the surface; that in passing from one point to another light always takes the course which occupies least time; that white light is not homogeneous—the rays composing it are refracted in different degrees, and may therefore be separated from each other; that colour depends upon refrangibility—the least refrangible rays producing the sensation of red, the most refrangible that of violet, the intermediate tints, the other prismatic colours lie between these extremes.

A highly-successful bazaar was held at Bedford last week. The object of the sale being to raise a fund for the restoration or improvement of the vicarage-house at Cople, as a complimentary acknowledgment to the Rev. Henry E. Havergal of his efforts in promoting a taste and knowledge of good music.

The Swallow Steel-mill, Blackburn, was burnt to the ground on the morning of Thursday week. The mill, which was the property of Mr. Henry Ward, of Balderstone, was a brick building four stories high, and contained upwards of 20,000 spindles. The damage is estimated at no less than £30,000, only a portion of which is covered by insurance.

The Liverpool Town Council has recommended Mr. Stamford Raffles to the Home Secretary as a gentleman who, from his legal abilities and local knowledge as a barrister, is highly suited for the Liverpool stipendiaryship. There were three other applications to the Liverpool Town Council, and ninety-six to the Home Secretary, for the situation.

On Monday came before the High Court of Justiciary, at Edinburgh, the cases of Mr. James Hunter and Mr. Thomas Pennock resisting the officers in the execution of their duty while collecting the annuity tax. The jury returned a verdict of acquital in both cases, an announcement which was received with loud cheers.

The Edinburgh News says it has reason to believe that the Reform Bill for Scotland has been prepared, and that it does not contain any clauses placing Scotland on an equality with England in the matter of the county franchise. The bill, our contemporary continues, will not go further than what the Scotch bill of the Derby Government was to consist of—a £10 occupancy and £5 property franchise.

A meeting of shipwrights employed at Woolwich Dockyard was held at the Townhall, Woolwich, on Tuesday, to adopt measures for obtaining a more equitable system of calculating the wages earned by this body of artisans. Several addresses of a practical nature were delivered, and it was ultimately resolved to communicate with the employés of other Government dockyards on the subject.

The death of a young man in the employ of Mr. Moffat, of the High Mill, Eamont Bridge, is reported in the Westmorland Gazette. Having occasion to go out with a cart, he put into a loaded gun, and threw his great-coat over it. Before starting, however, he got on the cart, and was in the act of lifting his coat, when the gun went off, and the contents were lodged in his throat. Death was instantaneous, the windpipe having been servered.

The Southampton Athenæum held its eleventh annual literary soirée on Tuesday evening at the Victoria Rooms. The large room was densely crowded. Lord Palmerston had promised to take part in the proceedings, but shortly before the hour of meeting a letter from his private secretary, specially dispatched from London, stated that his Lordship would be unable to attend. Mr. Digby Seymour, M.P., and Mr. Dutton, M.P., were the chief speakers of the evening.

An ascent of Scawfell Pike, the highest mountain in England, was made last week by a gentleman who was staying at Wastdale Head. The summit of the mountain was for about eight hundred feet covered with hard frozen snow, which in many places lay in drifts several feet deep; and for about five hundred feet a dense mist prevented the climber obtaining any view, and greatly increased the difficulty of the descent. The ascent was made without a guide or any other companion.

The committee of the Deddington Union Beneficial Society met a few days ago to investigate a charge brought against a member, Mr. Henry West, the parish clerk of Upper Heyford, of "breach of the rules, by officiating at a wedding while on the funds of the society." After a long deliberation it was decided that, in accordance with the 21st rule, which stated that a sick member "shall not transact any business" during illness, West should be expelled.

ART IN PRESTON.—On Monday night it was resolved, at a public meeting of the members of the Mechanics' Institution at Preston, to establish a School of Art, under the regulations laid down by Government. The Marquis of Hartington and Colonel Wilson Patten, the member for the northern division of the county, together with the leading gentry of the borough and neighbourhood, have consented to become patrons of the school.

The certificates granted by the Secretary of State to the under-mentioned Reformatory Schools have been withdrawn:—The Berks Reformatory School at Reading, in the county of Berks; the Norfolk Reformatory at Catton, in the county of Norfolk; and to the Bath Sutcliffe School.

It is in contemplation by the Liberal party in Gloucester to present a testimonial to Mr. Price, late M.P. for the city, in recognition of the eminent service he rendered during the time he represented it in Parliament. Subscriptions are now being raised for this purpose.

MR. CONINGHAM, M.P. for Brighton, met his constituents on Monday, and was most cordially received. He contended that the best way to promote peace with France was to keep on close terms of alliance with that country. The hon. member said that he had no sympathy with the war in China, and he appealed to the constituencies of England to be on the look out for the coming Reform, so that it might be real, and not a sham. A vote of confidence in Mr. Coningham was carried unanimously, amid reiterated cheers.

A collision occurred last Saturday at the Ratho Station, on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, between an express-train and two trucks loaded with whisky, which were at the time being shunted. The passengers in the front carriages of the express-train were severely shaken, and the stoker was thrown off the engine. The whisky-barrels were smashed, and part of the spirit caught fire with the hot cinders from the engine. The collision caused the whisky to spread like a shower over the engine, which was damaged materially.

A plan of making annual congregational collections on behalf of the Birmingham charities has been determined an. At a meeting of the clergy and ministers of religion it has been agreed to set apart the last Sunday in October of every year for the purpose. For the sake of securing unity of action among all religious bodies, it has been resolved to restrict the appeal to the benefit of institutions devoted to the relief of physical suffering, it being feared that an admission of those dealings with educational element would risk the completeness of success.

THE WORKPEOPLE IN LACE FACTORIES.—A public meeting of master and operative lacemakers was held last Saturday evening in the Assembly Rooms, Nottingham, to consider what means might exist for lessening the distress which the lacemakers are at present suffering. It was resolved that a petition be presented to both Houses of Parliament praying them to take into consideration the shortening of the hours of labour of women and children who are engaged in the making or manufacturing of lace; that the Earl of Shaftesbury be requested to present it to the House of Lords, and Mr. Mellor (the borough member) in the House of Commons.

THE PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION OF GRAVESEND.—The Mayor, Mr. Oakes, Mr. Reed, Mr. Crook, and Mr. Pryce, the deputation appointed at the late meeting, waited by appointment on the Home Secretary yesterday week. The memorial was read and presented by the Mayor. Sir George C. Lewis asked various questions respecting the borough and the amount of population it included, and stated that the Government would not be disposed to add to existing boroughs, or to constitute new ones, by adding to the town population the inhabitants of surrounding districts, as this would be an injury to the county constituencies. Sir George, however, intimated that the memorial would receive due consideration.

TESTIMONIALS.—On Monday evening a crowded public meeting was held at Chatham for the purpose of presenting a testimonial (subscribed for by the officers, clerks, and artisans of Chatham Dockyard, to Messrs. Martin and Kinglake, the members for Rochester, and Sir F. Smith, M.P. for Chatham, for their unwearied exertions in the House of Commons to promote the interests of the civil servants of the Crown.——On Wednesday se'nnight Mr. H. Blackmore received from a number of friends at Blackpool some elegant articles of silver plate, as an acknowledgment of the services he has rendered to that fashionable watering-place in his capacity of traffic manager for the western section of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

ACCUSATION OF WHOLESALE MURDER.—Lane and Hires, the first and second mates of the American ship Anna, were again brought before the Isle of Wight magistrates last Saturday on the charge of murdering six coloured seamen on the high seas. Evidence was given of the hideous crimes alleged to have been committed by the prisoners, but, the question of jurisdiction having been raised, the Bench were compelled to discharge both men. The matter will, however in all probability, be taken up by the American Consul. The captain of the Anna, who is not implicated in the charge, states that, during the voyage, the yellow fever broke out on board, and that the mates "attributed the disappearance of the 'darkies'" to the ravages of that dreadful disease.

PROTESTANT DEMONSTRATION AT BELFAST.—The Northern Daily Whig reports at great length the proceedings of a great demonstration on behalf of the present system of Irish national education which was held in Belfast on Wednesday week. The meeting was convened by the Ulster National Education Association, and there were present dignitaries of the Established Church, doctors of divinity of dissenting denominations, and other reverend gentlemen, deputy lieutenants, magistrates, professors of the colleges, a large number of town councillors, merchants, and private gentlemen. Major-General Chesney occupied the chair. Speeches were delivered by the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, Professors Gilson and McCosh, and other distinguished men.

A REPORTER IN CHURCH.—An amusing, though not very decorous, scene took place on Sunday last at the church of Colton, a little village near Rugeley, in Staffordshire. Mr. Horsfall, M.P., and the Rev. A. Seaton, Rector of the parish, have been at war for some time past, and the Rector having on former occasions spoken against his opponent from the pulpit, a shorthand-writer was sent in last Sunday to report the rev. gentleman's words. The clergyman soon caught sight of the pencil and paper, and protested against the reporter's presence, desiring the churchwarden to remove him. This the churchwarden had no power to do, and the reporter declined to go. The result was that the clergyman broke off the service, and, remarking on the conduct of persons who "can neither enter into the kingdom of Heaven themselves nor allow other people to enter there," dismissed the congregation.

THE HON. MR. ANSON, M.P. for Lichfield, has issued an address to his constituents, in which he says:—"The General under whom I served throughout the whole of the munity in India having been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the expedition to China, and having called upon me for my services, I felt it my duty without hesitation to leave home and join him. This decision on my part will, I feel confident, meet with your approval; and, if through your kindness I am permitted to retain my seat in Parliament, and am spared to return to my duties as your representative, I shall have gained a more intimate acquaintance with many important questions affecting our relations with Oriental States which are becoming every day more mixed up with our home politics, and which have hitherto been little understood or appreciated either by the people or the Legislature of this country.'

DR. DIXON, the Roman Catholic "Primate of all Ireland," has issued a letter to the faithful of Drogheda, in which he administers the lash to Louis Napoleon with unsparing hand. By the publication of his "infamous address" to the Pope, the Emperor "has thrown off the mask," and he stands before the world "a well-armed captain of a gang of robbers," whose "appropriate residence would be the prison of Ham," rather than the luxurious Palace of the Tuileries. The melancholy spectacle of the "chivalrous French nation lying prostrate under the feet of such a ruler" draws a pitying tear from the sympathetic eye of the most rev. prelate; but, still, terrible as has been the treachery of the first son of the Church, there remains a faint gleam of hope that the demand of indignant Catholic Christendom, "Robber, take your hand from the throat of the Vicar of Christ" (the demand is made with all the emphasis of capitals), will fall with effect upon his rebellious soul, and "paralyse the hand stretched out against the Holy Father."

DIABOLICAL ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP A SHOP.—A few nights ago an attempt was made to blow up the shop belonging to Mr. Greenfield, horsenail-maker, at Hart's Hill, Dudley. Mr. Greenfield unites with his trade of a nailmaker that of a brewer and beerhouse-keeper, and on the night in question he was up later than usual, engaged in running the wort off. Between twelve and one o'clock he thought he heard a noise in his nail-shop, and went to ascertain the cause. He discovered that a round hole had been cut in the woodwork of the shop, and that a bag, containing about 7lb. of gunpowder, had been thrown in through the opening thus made. The bag containing the powder was in appearance a meal-bag, and to it was attached a staylace, by which it was thrown into the shop, through the hole above referred to. To another portion of the bag one end of a safety-fuse twenty-three feet in length was attached—a length and description of fuse which would give ample time for the miscreants to make their escape. No clue has yet been obtained to the villains, who were compelled to leave all their apparatus behind them.

GREAT MEETING OF TYNE SHIPOWNERS.—A large meeting of Tyne shipowners was held on Thursday week in the Temperance Hall, North Shields—the Mayor of Tynemouth in the chair—to take into consideration the present depressed state of the shipping interest, and to adopt a petition to Parliament on the subject. There were deputations from Newcastle, South Shields, and other shipping places, and the Hon. H. S. Liddell, Mr. Hugh Taylor, M.P., and other gentlemen spoke. The Hon. H. S. Liddell, M.P., could give the meeting no hope that the Legislature would ever allow Government to enforce reciprocity in any form; and Mr. Hugh Taylor, M.P., expressed an opinion that steam-vessels would beat sailing-vessels out of the leading European markets. He therefore advised a prudent investment by shipowners in steam-shipping property. Resolutions were passed expressing "dismay" at the manner in which the shipping of other nations is "displacing" that of Great Britain, and condemning the existing law as establishing "an injurious protective bounty in favour of aliens." A petition to Parliament was also agreed to, praying for the appointment of a committee to investigate the cause of "this depression in British shipping," and suggesting that "if found to originate in unfair competition with foreign vessels, then the Queen in council shall put in force the power vested in her by clauses 10 and 11, in Act 12 and 13 Victoria, to tax foreign vessels in a similar manner to which our ships are taxed in their ports."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Captain M'Donnell, 4th Dragoon Guards, has been appointed an extra Aide-de-Camp to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

It is in contemplation to establish a school of practical engineering at Colchester Camp.

The Tipperary Militia have left the Isle of Wight, and been replaced by the Durham Artillery.

It is announced, and with an air of authority, that the Government propose to erect cavalry barracks at Colchester, and that the site will be the parade-ground on the Military-road.

Recruiting for the Corps of Royal Engineers is being carried on with great spirit. Several of the East India troops who have lately been discharged have also re-enlisted into the Royal Engineers.

It is rumoured that Major-General Windham will shortly succeed Major-General Sir Sidney Cotton, K.C.B., in command of the division on the Affghan frontier.

An order relative to an increased supply of ammunition has been issued to all military storekeepers, by order of the Secretary of State for War.

Rear-Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, K.C.B., has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the North American and West India station, vice Rear-Admiral Sir Houston Stewart, whose period of service has expired.

The United Service Gazette gives currency to a rumour, which "gains credit in military circles," that it is the intention of the Government to disband the militia now embodied early in spring.

The examination of candidates by the Council of Military Education for admission to the Royal Indian Military College, Addiscombe, commenced on Monday, at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, and terminates on the 27th inst.

A battery of fourteen guns at Shirley, near Southampton, the property of Mr. Waterman, has been offered by him to the Corporation of Southampton for the defence of the town, or to be used for practice by an artillery corps.

We believe, says the Army and Navy Gazette, that Lord Cardigan will before long resign the office of Inspector-General of Cavalry, and rumour states that Major-General Lawrenson will succeed to that post, Lord George Paget obtaining the cavalry brigade at Aldershott.

The Board of Admiralty has decided on taking the examinations of candidates for apprenticeship in Chatham Dockyard entirely out of the hands of the dockyard officers, and placing them under the control of the Civil Service Commissioners.

The Colonelcy of the 73rd Foot has become vacant by the demise of Lieutenant-General C. Grant Falconer, K.H., who died a few days since at his seat in Scotland. The gallant deceased had been upwards of sixty-four years in the Army, having entered the service in September, 1795.

James Martin, gunner, Marine Artillery, has been sentenced by a Court-martial to be hanged at the yard-arm, for striking Lieutenant Daly, R.M., while in the execution of his duty. Another gunner, named John Dillon, has been sentenced, for assaulting the same officer, to receive fifty lashes, be imprisoned two years, and lose all pay.

It is rumoured that Major-General Sir James Scarlett, now commanding at Portsmouth, will succeed General Knollys in the command of the division at Aldershott. "We believe," says the Army and Navy Gazette, "the rumour is somewhat premature, although not improbably it may be eventually justified by the fact."

Colonel Bloomfield, commanding the troops in the Colchester district, has been appointed to the command of the second infantry brigade of the division at Dublin, to replace Major-General Cunynghame, C.B., who proceeds to India. It is not known who is to be Colonel Bloomfield's successor, various names being mentioned.

The United Service Gazette narrates the enlistment of a French soldier in the Queen's 31st Regiment at Chatham, last week. The cause of this unusual proceeding was a friendship that he had formed in the Crimea for a corporal of that corps. The recruit, who cannot speak English, has enlisted under the Britannic name of Smith, an alias previously adopted by a much more illustrious French exile.

Pattern suits for volunteer corps have been deposited at the War Office for inspection, and after the 24th inst. coloured drawings will be supplied on application. On page 69 of this week's supplement the pattern uniforms recommended by the authorities are engraved.——The rifle corps at Bradford have appointed a Chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Burnet, the Vicar.——The ladies of Aylsham have presented an elegant plated bugle to the rifle company formed in that town and district.

Sergeant Edward Connors, of the 1st battalion of the 10th Foot, was on Saturday last presented by the officers of his regiment with a handsome silver watch and chain, "as a mark of their esteem of his good and gallant conduct during a period of twenty-two years in the regiment." The sergeant served throughout the Sutlej and Punjab campaigns and Indian mutiny, and was twice severely wounded. He wears four medals and three clasps.

The manufacture of Armstrong's guns at Woolwich continues with undiminished success. Twenty nine-pounders were proved, with perfect satisfaction, last week, and this week a similar number will be tested. All these guns, the Times tells us, are models of scientific workmanship; but, if we may believe a statement which appears in the Army and Navy Gazette, the same high praise cannot be awarded to their fittings. The carriages of the pieces lately shipped to go to China are declared to be rotten. This, however, has been stoutly denied.

The chain of forts round the port and arsenal of Plymouth are as follows:—Tregantle and Screasdown now in progress, on the Cornish side of the River Tamar; the hill on Ernesettle, the high ground east of Burrington House, ditto near Tor, and on the east of Mannamead; the site of the round tower at Lipson, and the hill above the quarries at Catdown. These forts will be connected by a deep trench, with ramparts of granite and limestone, with earthworks twenty-eight feet thick. In continuation of these forts it is also proposed to erect another at Wembury.

SAILORS' HOME, DOVER.—The report for the past year of this benevolent institution, which has been the means of conferring important benefits on seafaring men, gives a favourable account of its progress and usefulness. As a temporary refuge for shipwrecked sailors of all nations it has been instrumental to great good, for in the course of the past year the crews, or those of them who were saved, belonging to sixteen wrecked vessels, were brought to the home, where they met with the care and kindness of which they stood in need; besides which, when brought within the sphere of the institution, their spiritual welfare, no less than their temporal necessities, forms an object of unremitting attention. We are glad to perceive from the report that the directors have reason to be satisfied with the pecuniary support accorded to the institution, and that it is intended to establish a school for navigation, trade, and commerce, which will be available for youths intended for the sea, and for men desiring to prepare themselves for passing the examination of the Board of Trade.

NEWSPAPERS FOR TUSCANY.—In order to ensure the transmission of newspapers for Tuscany by the quickest route—that is, viâ Sardinia—they must be paid on being posted in this country, according to the following scale:—For a packet not exceeding four ounces, 4d.; above four ounces, and not exceeding half a pound, 8d.; with an additional charge of 8d. for every half-pound. If the above rates are paid the newspapers are not only forwarded by the quickest route, but they are exempt from further charge of any kind on delivery. Newspapers for Tuscany are, however, frequently posted without sufficient postage having been paid upon them for transmission by this route; for example, with a payment of 1d. only for a packet of four ounces; and, in such case, they can be sent only in the mail to France for conveyance thence to Leghorn by the French packet, which leaves Marseilles once a week. Such newspapers are, consequently, often much longer in reaching their destination; besides which, the postage paid being merely the French transit rate, they are subject to an additional charge on delivery.

SALE OF THE LIBRI LIBRARY.—The choicest portion of the library of M. Libri—perhaps the most eminent collector of rare books in the present day—was submitted to public auction by Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson during the past fortnight, and the prices realised for specimens of the ancient bindings were marvellous. The collection exhibited specimens of the finest bibliopegistic skill from the fifteenth century to the present time, and embraced not only the magnificent samples of binding bestowed on the volumes by private amateurs like Grolier, Maioli, De Thou, Count d'Hoym, Longepierre, and others equally celebrated, but was particularly rich in books which formerly had been the private property of Popes, Emperors, Kings, Princes, Cardinals, and reigning Sovereigns of England, France, Italy, Germany, &c., all magnificently bound, and bearing either their arms or the devices known to have been adopted by them. These seem to have been collected with a view of tracing the history of ornamentation; and many of the volumes are undoubtedly magnificent specimens of the taste of the former possessors, who, according to the prefatory letter of M. Libri prefixed to the catalogue, availed themselves of the skill of the best artists to obtain designs or patterns, several of which are known to have been furnished by Giovanni da Verona, Andrea del Sarto, le petit Bernard, and even the great Raphael himself. The catalogue abounds with rarities of the first class.

THE PALACE OF THE LUXEMBOURG, PARIS.

When the news of the late fire at the Luxembourg Palace first spread over Paris, alarming and exaggerated reports of its extent took possession of the public mind. This favourite resort of the Parisians, who come from all directions to visit its picture galleries and its charming gardens and statues, was said to have been shorn of its most precious treasures by the devouring element, and painful regrets were excited at the presumed loss of its collection of paintings by living artists, its throne-room, its library, its chapel, and its numerous chambers of historic celebrity. Fortunately these rumours turned out to be incorrect, and the loss was limited to the Salle des Séances, or the amphitheatre in which the Senate holds its meetings. This amphitheatre was of modern date, having been constructed in 1836 by M. Alphonse de Gisors. The pecuniary loss occasioned by this fire is considerable, but most of the treasures of art and history were happily preserved through the skilful efforts of the numerous firemen, many of whom were severely injured. By a singular coincidence one of our artists had been for some time previously engaged in the Palace in making for this Journal two drawings representing the Throne Room and the restored Chamber of Mary de Medicis, which we have much pleasure in placing before our readers.

The foundations of the Palace of the Luxembourg were laid in 1615. It took its appellation from the hotel and gardens of that name which had previously been purchased by Mary of Medicis. The celebrated architect Jacques Desbrosses was charged by the Queen with the construction of the building, and he took for his model the Pitti Palace at Florence, where Mary of Medicis was born. The Luxembourg Palace forms a parallelogram, but is, without contradiction, one of the finest in existence, its exterior presenting a remarkably imposing grandeur of character. It was at first called the Palais Medicis, but the Queen having bequeathed it to her second son, Gaston, Duke of Orleans, the name of the Palace of Orleans was given to it, which was engraved on a marble plate over the grand entrance, where it remained down to the time of the Revolution. But, in spite of these appellations, the people had always called the palace of Mary of Medicis by the name of the hotel on the site of which it was raised, the Palace of the Luxembourg. It was here that Richelieu carried on the first intrigues that led to his subsequent good fortune. After the exile of Mary, Gaston of Orleans came into possession of it. Subsequently it passed successively to Mademoiselle the Duchess of Montpensier, to the Duchess of Guise, and, in 1694, to Louis XIV. After the death of the King it returned to the Orleans family, and the Regent gave it up to his daughters. The famous Duchess of Berry rendered it the scene of numerous scandals, at that time too prevalent in most European Courts. In 1778 it was given by Louis XVI. to his brother, the Count de Provence (afterwards Louis XVIII.), who inhabited it down to the period of his flight in 1791. Under the first Republic the Luxembourg was converted into a prison, which received by turns the Girondins, the Dantonists, Robespierre for a short interval, Thomas Paine, the painter David, &c. During the Reign of Terror this ci-devant abode of Royalty was known by the name of the Magasin de la Guillotine. After having been successively the palace of the Directory, of the Consulate, and of the Conservative Senate, it became, in 1814, the sitting-place of the Chamber of Peers. In 1815 all the old pictures were sent to the Louvre, and the great gallery was thrown open for the exhibition of the paintings of living artists, to which it is now limited. From February to June, 1848, the Labour Commission, under the presidence of M. Louis Blanc, held its meetings in this palace, since which time it has been appropriated to the sittings of the Upper Chamber, and called, by distinction, the Palais du Sénat, of which M. Troplong is the President. We now proceed to give a few details of interest relating to our Illustrations.

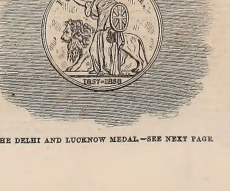
THE THRONE ROOM OF THE LUXEMBOURG.

The Salle du Trône of the Luxembourg is remarkable for the richness of its decoration, but recently terminated at great cost. The styles of several periods are harmoniously blended, and the shades of the gilding extremely numerous and even sometimes varied at the intercalation of silver. M. de Gisors has displayed great ability in this rich ornamentation, and the visitor is dazzled by its brilliant effect. In this respect this Throne Room surpasses any other in Europe. In the middle of the gallery of the salle is the throne, said to be a relic of the First Empire; above which is a beautifully-painted cupola, representing the apotheosis of Napoleon I., executed by Barthélemy. The two principal pictures, painted by Lehmann, are the hemicycles, one at each end of the room. The one representa France, under the reigns of the Merovingian Kings, awakening to Truth and Independence, and is full of historical and allegorical figures, with a beautiful allusion to Christianity raising herself upon the ruins of Roman paganism and Druid worship; on the left side of the cross Clovis is receiving baptism; and on the opposite side the conqueror Charlemagne is imposing the same rite on Witikind and his Saxon followers. The other hemicycle is consecrated to France under the Capets, the Valois, and the Bourbons. The principal subjects of it are Peter the Hermit preaching the Crusades; Philippe Augustus combating the League; Joan of Arc holding the Oriflamme; François I.; Henry IV. on horseback in the midst of the soldiers of the League disarmed and Civil Discord appeased; and, finally, Louis XIV. on an estrade, surrounded by the most illustrious men of his epoch—thus picturing the French Monarchy at its zenith. There are a number of new pictures in the panels commemorative of different events during the reign of the present Emperor, among which may be mentioned the return of the Pope to Rome under the protection of French troops; the distribution of eagles to the army; and the Emperor, in private clothes, superintending the works of the new Louvre. This latter picture is seen on the left hand of our Illustration.

THE CHAMBER OF MARY DE MEDICIS.



This so-called Chamber of Mary de Medicis is situated on the ground floor (or, as the French call it, the rez-de-chaussée) of the Palace. The ordinary name given to this room is a vulgar error, which took its origin in the circumstance that it was decorated in 1817 with numerous fragments of wainscoting and paintings which had previously adorned the apartments of the Queen Regent in the Louvre and in the Luxembourg. In reality it was formerly known by the name of the Room of the Golden Book (Salle du Livre d'Or), because, during the reigns of Louis XVIII. and Charles X., it was the depository of the titles and armorials of the Peerage—at that time hereditary. The materials for the decoration of this chamber had been collected by the architect Chalgrin during the period when the revolutionary Government of the Directory were having considerable alterations made in the interior of the Palace previously to their installation; but Chalgrin's intention was not then carried out: and it was only in 1817 that M. de Gisors' predecessor, the late M. Provost, had the fortunate opportunity of turning these precious fragments to account for the decoration of the Salle du Livre d'Or.

The arabesques on gold ground which ornament the pillars, doors, and shutters, are in the best Italian style; they are attributed to Jean d'Udine, one of the most clever artists of the Raphaelite school. The pilasters supporting the ceiling are of the Corinthian order. The ceiling itself is divided into three compartments: that of the centre represents the apotheosis of Mary de Medicis, painted by Van Hoeck. The numerous panels forming the outer border were painted by Van Thulden, and typify Power, Patience, Victory, Minerva, and Neptune. The other paintings comprised in this chamber, which are remarkable in an artistic point of view, are by different masters, some of them portraits of the Medicis (shown in our Engraving), which were executed by Rubens, whom Mary invited to Paris at the end of 1620. Among these may be mentioned the portraits of the Queen (represented as Pallas), the Grand Duke François de Medicis, and the Grand Duchess Joan of Austria. There are also a fine painting representing the twelve signs of the zodiac, done by Jordaens, the pupil and friend of Rubens; some other allegorical paintings, generally attributed to Giordano; besides a few medallions near the door on the right and on the ceiling by Nicolas Poussin and Philippe de Champagne, whose names add to the artistic éclat of this chamber, which is a subject of great interest to all visitors. Upon the tables seen in our Engraving are signed the actes de mariages of the senators, whose weddings are celebrated in a small chapel attached to the palace.

Many of the above details are adduced on the authority of M. Alphonse de Gisors, the present architect of the Luxembourg, under whose able direction this chamber has just been perfectly restored.

MADAME ENDERSSOHN.

THIS lady, one of the most accomplished English vocalists of the day, is a native of Newcastle-on-Tyne. She is the daughter of Mr. Thomas Graham, formerly an eminent professor of music in that town, and now resident in the neighbourhood of Manchester. She commenced her musical education under her father, and gained great proficiency, which she retains, as a pianist; but her remarkable vocal gifts, which showed themselves at an early age, led her to the cultivation of that branch of the profession. She accordingly received instructions in singing from Crivelli and Negri for three years; and then went to Italy, where she pursued her studies under Mazucato. On her return she married her present husband, a gentleman distinguished for his taste in music and poetry, and known to the public as the author of lyrical poems of great merit. Her last instructor was Sir George Smart, under whose able and experienced care she devoted herself especially to the study of sacred music. Being thus prepared by a complete course of education, she made her début, in 1851, at Mr. Hullah's concerts, in Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with a degree of success which at once established her in the favour of the public. Since that period she has had a career of constant success; singing at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, the oratorios of the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall, the concerts at the Crystal Palace, the Monday Popular Concerts, and many of the principal musical performances in the provinces. During this time, moreover, she has always been making progress in her art; and certainly at the present day she sings with greater power and beauty of voice and with greater finish of style than at any previous period of her life. She is, too, a pleasing and successful composer. Her songs and ballads, remarkable for their sweet and expressive melody and unaffected simplicity of style, are becoming more and more popular. Several of them have been noticed in our columns with the praise they deserve; and a serenade of her composition, "The Star of Night," appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of October 29, 1853.

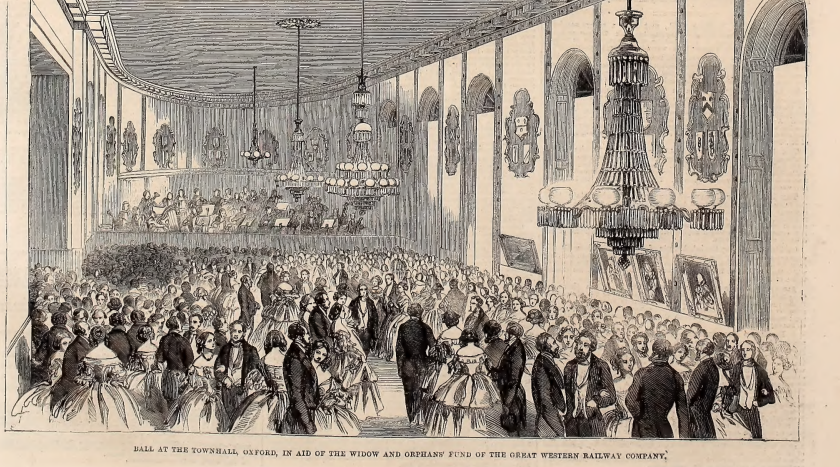
GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY BALL.

ON Monday so'nnight the eighth annual ball in aid of the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Great Western Railway Company, under the patronage of the board of directors, and the Mayor and Mayoress and Corporation of Oxford, took place at Oxford, with more than usual éclat. The arrangements provided by the company and the Corporation, and the Widows' and Orphans' Society, were of the most satisfactory character. Special trains of first-class carriages were dispatched from the various stations along the line, where tickets had been sold to convey to and from Oxford all those who desired to attend the ball. The spacious Townhall, where the ball took place, was covered with a diaper cloth, and supplied with gas and coal free of expense to the society. The proceeds of the ball are applied towards the support of 99 widows and 168 children of late employés of this company. It is estimated that not less than 600 persons were present. Dancing was kept up until a late hour. Among the company present were the Mayor and Mayoress of Oxford, the Mayor of Gloucester, the late Mayors of Oxford and Gloucester, and a great number of gentlemen resident in the neighbourhood; also many of the railway officials committee of management, and others connected with the company. Mr. Drinkwater, of the George Hotel, catered most efficiently for the requirements of the company.



RAILWAY BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—A meeting of railway officials was held on Thursday week at Swansea—Mr. Dillwyn, M.P., in the chair. The chairman, having expressed his entire approval of the institution and his willingness to promote its usefulness, called upon the secretary, Mr. Burr, who explained the principles of the proposed institution. The following resolution was passed unanimously:—"That this meeting has heard with satisfaction the explanation of the principles of the Railway Benevolent Institution, and believes that, with an extension of its present bases, it will supply a want much felt by the railway body at large." Successful meetings in behalf of the institution have been held also at Newcastle-on-Tyne and other places.

THE DELHI AND LUCKNOW MEDAL.

THIS characteristic testimonial of the Indian mutiny (which may be regarded as the final incident) has been struck at her Majesty's Mint in silver, and is now in course of distribution. The design is by Mr. Wyon. The obverse bears the effigy of her Majesty; the reverse (engraved on the preceding page) shows the figure of Britannia, holding in her outstretched hand a wreath; in the background a British lion. The ribbon is white, with two stripes of red.

THE CHAPTER HOUSE, WESTMINSTER.

THIS venerable piece of antiquity was lately the repository of very valuable records, as we find from the following description in Mr. J. Timbs's "Curiosities of London:"—"The Chapter House is now a treasury of records, including the Star Chamber proceedings. But the gem of the place is William the Conqueror's Doomsday Book, in excellent condition from searchers not being allowed to touch the text or writing. Here, too, are Clement VII.'s Golden Bull, confirming the title of Defender of the Faith upon Henry VIII.; a treaty of perpetual peace between Henry VIII. and Francis I., with a gold seal, six inches in diameter, said to be the work of Cellini; the orginal wills of Richard II., Henry V., Henry VII., and Henry VIII., and the indenture between Henry VII. and the Abbot of Westminster, a glorious specimen of miniature painting and velvet binding, with enamelled and gilt bosses. The Chapter House is octagonal in plan, and on one of its sides is a statue called St. John, said to be one of the oldest sculptures in the abbey. This was a beautifully-decorated building, with painted walls, and coloured and gilded arcades, and high arched windows in seven of its sides, now sadly obscured." Since Mr. Timbs wrote his work the various treasures have been transferred to the Record Office, Chancery Lane, and nothing now remains within the walls but the presses and cases which once contained them. It is in contemplation to restore this chamber to its original beauty, and we sincerely hope the intention will be carried into effect, thereby adding another gem to the Abbey of Westminster.

BALL AT THE TOWNHALL, OXFORD, IN AID OF THE WIDOW AND ORPHANS' FUND OF THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE thirst at Tattersall's to see the weights for the great Spring Handicaps has been very promptly satisfied by the Northamptonshire and Chester officials. The scale in both is the same to one pound, as the former begins at 9st. and ends at 4st. 4lb., and the latter has 9st. 4lb. and 4st. 7lb. as its limits. Tournament holds, in both instances, the post of honour, and each handicapper brackets Trumpeter and Promised Land. Newcastle and Gaspard are also in a bracket for the Chester Cup, while the former has to concede 2lb. at Northampton. On the merits of Adam Bede there is by no means such unanimity between the handicappers as there is among readers and critics, seeing that Gaspard gives him 5lb. at one place and 8lb. at the other. Paleface, 6st., at Northampton, and Nutbourne, 6st. 4lb., at Chester, are the principal Derby favourite estimates; and Musjid, 8st. 4lb., gives 4lb. to Trumpeter and Promised Land for Chester, and receives 10lb. from Underhand.

Lord Londesborough's death—the fourth that has occurred in the Jockey Club in less than three months—took place last Sunday morning. His Lordship was always a very keen, though somewhat whimsical, sportsman, but his luck seemed to be ripening at last. His first racers were at John Osborne's, but did so little that he was looked upon as quite a new man when he reappeared on the turf about seven years ago. He then trained for a time with John Scott, and was singularly unfortunate in his purchase of two one-thousand-guinea yearlings, Seamstress and Mario, during the Yellow Jack mania, as neither of them proved worth as many pence. Still, nothing daunted, he gave, it was said, 5000 guineas, if not more, for West Australian in his four-year-old season, and won the Ascot Cup, after a grand finish with Kingston, and the Goodwood Four-year-old Stakes as well; but the great crack's leg gave way before he could meet Virago for the Doncaster Cup; and thus John Scott "could never really tell how good he was." In 1855 his Lordship gave 3100 guineas for Stockwell at the Burleigh sale—just 100 guineas beyond the reserve price; but, if the foreigners would have gone on, the Grimston commission was by no means exhausted. Warlock was subsequently added to his stud, for 2500gs., and hence the Grimston Paddocks can boast of three St. Leger winners, side by side, purchased at an average of 3500gs. each, and one of them perhaps the most fashionable of the day. For a short time after they left John Scott's his Lordship's horses were trained by his private trainer, Smith, at Hambleton, where he went to the expense of a range of new and very complete stables, but that dynasty lasted a very short time, and they were suddenly sold in a lot to "Mr. S. Williams." This gentleman afterwards parted with one of them, Knight of Kars (for whom upwards of a thousand guineas was paid when a yearling), to Lord Clifden, for a sum sufficient to pay for the whole. However, his Lordship had his turn at last, when he bought a small and motley lot of four from Admiral Harcourt, as one of them—Summerside, by West Australian, and trained by Tom Taylor at Bretby—won the Oaks last year. Several engagements become void by his death, even among the entries of the present month. He entered keenly into the Yorkshiremen's love of their favourite sport, although, owing to his complaint, he was seldom able to bear the excitement of a racecourse, especially when his own horses were running. Beverley meeting had a very hearty support from him, and public and private coursers were never more welcome to pursue their favourite sport than at Londesborough Park. He would have been fifty-five in the October of this year.

An old light of the Cheshire hunting-field has also departed in the veteran Sir Henry Mainwaring, who was found dead on the floor of his bedroom a few days ago. It is upwards of twenty years since he gave up the mastership of the Cheshire, and Mr. Jeffrey Shakerley, Mr. Smith Barry, Captain White, his son (Mr. Mainwaring), and Earl Grosvenor have all succeeded to the post in turn. He was seventy-six; but for years, with the exception of riding out occasionally to see some cub-hunting with the Cheshire, or Sir Watkin, he had taken very little part in the sport. He had left Peover, whose hunt hospitalities will so long be remembered, and lived with his daughters very quietly at Marbury. Will Head was his huntsman for the first part of his nineteen years' mastership, and then came the Joe "Maiden who rides like a man." All the county knew the master on his grey, which was a monstrous hard puller; and, although not a first-flight man in days when the green collars could show nine or ten riders, including the three brothers Tomkinson, against any hunt in England, he went pluckily and well.

The run with Mr. Tailby's over the Keythorpe country on Thursday, followed by a very good day with the Quorn on Friday, are the principal ones we have heard of since our last in Leicestershire. The scent has much improved. There have been some fresh arrivals at Melton Mowbray, and more are expected.

Greek Fire has added the Baldock Cup to the credit of Weapon, and the fixtures for the next week are the Amicable Club, on Monday and Tuesday; Hawkstone, on Monday; Southminster (O) and Brough (Catterick), on Tuesday and Wednesday; Churchtown (Southport), on Wednesday; Chilton, on Wednesday and Thursday; and Baron Hill (Beaumaris), on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. G. Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., met with a severe accident whilst hunting with the Belvoir hounds yesterday week. The hon. member sustained a severe fracture of the collarbone, and was conveyed to Syston Park, the seat of Sir John Thorold, Bart., where he is going on satisfactorily.

Captain Williams terminates his long career as master of the Rufford hounds with the close of the present hunting season. For the past seventeen years he has successfully hunted the Rufford country, and during that time has trained one of the best packs in the midland counties.

We copied a paragraph from an Australian paper stating that a great sporting scandal had arisen in Melbourne, owing to Flying Buck, the winner of the great Champion race, having been beaten in the V. J. C. Derby, his jockey since publicly avowing his instructions were to hold him back. A relative of Mr. Yuille, the owner, writes to state that "the whole case has been investigated by the Jockey Club, who have publicly declared that not the slightest suspicion can be attached to the honour or integrity of Mr. Yuille."

THE FRENCH IN COCHIN CHINA.—According to the latest intelligence which had reached Singapore, on the 6th of December, another battle had been fought in Cochin China. The French lost, killed, Captain D'Aboville, of the Nemesis, and two other officers, one quartermaster, and four or five marines: wounded, several. The Cochin Chinese lost 120 killed and wounded.

THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN.—Accounts from Jeddo state that the Emperor of Japan, Foeo Tzigó, had fallen ill, and was for some days in rather an alarming state. At the last dates, however, his health had a little improved, and he was considered out of danger. The Emperor is a young man of twenty-two years of age, very intelligent, and entertaining political and commercial ideas which augur well for the future relations of the country with other Powers.

On New-Year's Day the inhabitants of Marburg, in Hesse-Cassel, were greatly edified by the sight of a huge gallows, with a man dangling on it, which some person had drawn on one of the walls of the house in which the ill-famed M. Hassenpflug—the man who abrogated the Constitution of 1831—lived.

Among the hostile parties now contending in Africa there are three Sabbaths celebrated in each week. The Sabbath of the Moors is on Friday; the Sabbath of the few Jews who fight in their ranks, as irregulars or settlers in the country, for their hearths and homes, is on Saturday; while the Sabbath of the Roman Catholic Spaniards is, like our own, on Sunday.

A REVEREND ADVENTURER.—The Leeds Mercury has a curious account of the career of the Rev. H. L. Bickerstaffe, who has been brought before the Leeds magistrates, charged with bigamy, having married Anna Maria Campbell, of Baker-street, London, at West Linton, Cambridgeshire, his wife, Mona Brougham Bickerstaffe, being still alive. The rev. prisoner, who is thirty-four years of age, was originally married early in life, when he obtained the curacy of Thorne, near Wakefield. He remained there two or three years, and subsequently went to St. Andrew's, Ancoats, Manchester; thence to Chorlton-cum-Hardy; and afterwards to Morecombe Bay, where he became unsettled. Four children were the fruits of the marriage. Having no income, quarrels ensued with the wife, and, having no means of living, he began to frequent public-houses. In 1858 he went to live at Headingly, but his behaviour became worse; and in January, 1859, he so ill-used his wife that she fled from his house. Nothing was heard of him until a paragraph appeared in the Times newspaper of the 11th of October last announcing the marriage of the Rev. Mr. Bickerstaffe, at Bartlow, near Linton, in Cambridgeshire, to a Miss Anna Maria Campbell, a lady possessed of £5000. It appeared that he had obtained a curacy at Thursley, in Surrey, where he had met the young lady, and secured her affections. The reverend gentleman is in the hands of the Leeds police.

LORD LONDESBOROUGH, long known as Lord Albert Conyngham, died on Sunday, in his fifty-sixth year. We intend to give a portrait and memoir of his Lordship next week.

The gross revenue of the Post Office department in the United States is £1,593,696, and the expenditure, £3,150,818. The gross revenue of the Post Office department in the United Kingdom is £3,100,939, and the expenditure £1,170,554.

AERIAL MESSENGERS.—Mr. Henry Coxwell, the well-known aeronaut, throws out a few suggestions to nautical men on the value of "aerial messengers." "Let every ship," he says, "be provided with an apparatus containing 1000 feet or so of compressed gas in a metallic receiver, the bulk of which need not be greater than a small cannon; also a couple of miniature balloons of 500 cubic feet capacity. As the balloon is sure to go before the wind, a vessel approaching land, or grounded on a lee shore, will always be in a position to communicate by this contrivance. In the event of a vessel being burnt at sea, or of going down through springing a leak, the aerial messenger might convey the ship's fate and papers in a waterproof bag across the waves until the shore was reached or attention attracted from a passing sail. By filling only two-thirds of the balloon, space would be left for expansion; and the messenger, harnessed to the water by a float, would continue suspended for a considerable time."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

OWING to the prospect of higher rates of discount accommodation, and the continued withdrawel of gold from the Bank of England for export purposes, added to an active inquiry for silver on Eastern account, and limited importations, some heaviness was produced in the funds this week, and a slight depression in the quotations. The Unfunded Debt has shown signs of weakness; but large quantities of Indian "Enfaced" Paper have been purchased by the public, leaving the supply in the market here very limited. The principal dealings have, however, been in the Five-and-a-Half per Cent Loan, the present interest upon which is guaranteed for twenty years; nevertheless, the Five per Cents, which will bear that amount of interest for twelve years have been somewhat active.

Since the last return was made up the amount in gold, withdrawn from the Bank, has amounted to nearly £250,000. The present steamer for India carries out over £500,000 in bullion, chiefly on private account, and for the purchase of rupee paper. The imports of specie have continued limited, and a very unfavorable turn has take place in the foreign exchanges; hence, we may safely assume that the whole of the gold now on passage from Australia will be taken for the Continent.

The demand for money has not been to say active; nevertheless, the rapid outflow of bullion has compelled the directors of the Bank of England to advance their minimum rate of discount to 3 per cent. Out of doors, money has advanced to an equal extent, although the supply is still abundant.

The contents of the French Emperor's letter to the Minister of State has been read with great interest in commercial and monetary circles. It has been well received, but evidently a considerable period must elapse ere the views contained in it are fully carried out.

The first payment on the Canadian loan has been met; but, some rather heavy sales having taken place, the Scrip has been flat, at 3⅜ ⅝ premium. The business done in the newly-formed companies' shares has not increased. Those in the San Paulo have been done at 3-16 to 1-16 dis.; Bank of Turkey, ¼ dis. to par; Ocean Marine Insurance, 1¼ to 1⅝ prem.; Universal Marine, 1-16 to ⅛ prem.; Rio Drainage, ⅛ to ¼ prem.; and City of London Brewery Preference, ⅛ to ¼ prem.

Meetings of several joint-stock banking companies have been held, and at which, for the most part, favourable reports have been presented. The half-yearly dividend of the Commercial Bank is announced at 3½; the City, 3; London and Westminster, 10; and the National Discount Company, 2½ per cent.

Mexican dollars have been sold at 62¾d. per ounce. Standard bar silver is quoted at 62½.

Advices from India state that the money market was in an easy state.

On Monday no change of importance took place in the value of Home Stocks. Bank Stock was 229½ 229; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents sold at 95⅝ ½; Consols, for Money, 95¼ ⅜ ½; Ditto, for Account, 95½ ¾; Long Annuities, 1880, 14; India Five per Cents, 104½ 103¾; Ditto Debentures, 1858, 98½ ⅝ ½; Ditto, 1859, 98½ ⅝; Ditto Bonds, 14s. 12s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 28s. prem.; India Five-and-a-Half per Cent Enfaced Paper was 103¾; Ditto Five per Cent, 97⅞ ½. The dealings on Tuesday were only moderate, as follows:—Bank Stock, 229½, 228, and 230; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 95⅝ ½; Consols, 95¼ ⅜ ½ ⅝; India Stock, 222½; Ditto Five per Cents, 104½ ½ ⅜ ½; Ditto Debentures, 96½ ⅝; Ditto Enfaced Paper, Five-and-a-Half per Cents, 104¼; Ditto, Five per Cents, 97⅝ ½ ¾ 98; Ditto Bonds, 12s. prem.; Consols, for Account, 95¼ ⅜; Exchequer Bills, 27s. to 31s. prem. Prices were rather drooping on the following day, although falls of Stock were not very numerous. Consols fluctuated between 95⅜ ½ for Money, and 95¼ and ½ for the Account. The Reduced and the New Three per Cents were 95½ ⅜; India Five per Cents, 104½ ⅜ ⅝; Ditto Debentures, 98¾ ½ ⅝; the Five per Cent Enfaced Paper was operated in at 98¼ ⅝, and the Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104½ ½. On Thursday business was very inactive, yet no change of importance took place in the quotations. Consols marked 95½ ½; for the Account, 95½ ⅜; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 95½ ⅜; India Loan Debentures, 98⅜ ⅝; Exchequer Bills, 25s. to 28s. prem.; Long Annuities, 17 13-16. India Enfaced Paper Five per Cent advanced to 98¾ 99; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104⅜ ⅞.

Generally, the dealings in the Foreign House have been tolerably numerous; but, compared with last week, the fluctuations in prices have not increased. Forced sales of stock have continued limited, and the leading quotations for the week are as follows:—Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1858, 94½; Buenos Ayres, Six per Cents, Deferred, 22; Chilian Six per Cents, 103½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 65¾; Dutch Eour per Cents, 102½; French Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 95f. 75c.; French Three per Cents, 68f. 25c.; Mexican Three per Cents, 22¼; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 95; Ditto, Uribarren, 81½; Peruvian Three per Cents, 71¼; Portuguese Three per Cents, 44½; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 98½; Russian Three per Cents, 65⅞; Spanish Three per Cents, 44½; Ditto, New Deferred, 33¼; Ditto, Committee's Certificates of Coupon, not funded, 4¾; Turkish Six per Cents, 79; Ditto, New, 66⅛; Turkish Four per Cents, 104⅝; Venezuela Three per Cents, 27⅜; Austrian Five per Cents, 56.

The transactions in Joint-stock Bank Shares have been rather limited; nevertheless, prices, continue firm. City have marked 66; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 17¾; National Provincial of England, 80; Ditto, New, 23 ex div.; Oriental, 40½; Ottoman, 18⅛; Union of Australia, 49; and Union of London, 29½.

Colonial Government Securities have attracted very little attention. Canada Six per Cents have realised 113½; New Brunswick Six per Cents, 108¾; New South Wales Five per Cents, 1888 and upwards, 99¾; and Victoria Six per Cents, 111½.

The Miscellaneous Market has been moderately active, as follows:—Berlin Waterworks, 5½; Crystal Palace, 1½; Ditto, Preference, 5½; Electric Telegraph, 109; English and Australian Copper, 2⅛; Madras Irrigation and Canal, 2⅞ ex div.; Netherlands Land, Eight per Cent Preference, ⅝; North British Australasian, 1; Peel River Land and Mineral, 53¾; Peninsular and Oriental Steam, 78; Ditto, New; 27¾; Red Sea and India Telegraph, 53; Van Dieman's Land, 11¼; Commercial Docks, 100¾ ex div.; London, 70¾ ex div.; Birmingham Canal, 95; Regent's, 20½ ex div.

Almost a general reduction has taken place in the value of Railway Shares, and the market, notwithstanding that the traffic receipts continue large, has been in a very inactive state. The dividend upon the Brighton line for the past half-year will be at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. Annexed are Thursday's official closing quotations:—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Nearly the whole of the supply of English wheat on offer to-day's market was in very poor condition. The few fine samples on the stands were readily disposed of at a trifle over last week's currency; but damp qualities were a dull inquiry, at late rates. The supply of foreign wheat was moderately good. The business done was not to say extensive, yet prices generally were well supported. Floating cargoes of grain were a slow inquiry. Barley, the show of which was moderate, changed hands to a fair extent, at late rates. We have to report a slow sale for both old and new malt, at about Monday's prices. Good and useful oats were in request, at full currencies; but inferior parcels commanded very little attention. Both beans and peas maintained their previous value. The flour trade ruled firm, at extreme rates.

English Grain sold last Week.—Wheat, 100,066; barley, 75,938; oats, 14,054; rye, 177; beans, 5123; peas, 2041 quarters.

Tea.—Advices from China state that the shipments amounted to 40,000,000lb. Although our market has become less active, very little change has taken place in the quotations. The value of common sound congou is 1s. 8½d. per lb.

Sugar.—There has been less activity in the demand for all raw sugars this week, and some descriptions have changed hands at a slight decline in value. West India qualities have sold at 37s. to 45s. 6d.; Bengal, 30s. to 45s.; native Madras, 32s. 6d. to 34s. 6d.; and Java, 41s. to 43s. 6d. per cwt. Refined goods are in fair request, at 52s. per cwt. for common brown lumps.

Coffee.—Since our last report the transactions, generally, have been restricted, at about previous quotations.

Rice.—The demand may be considered steady, at late rates. Low Rangoon has sold at 7s. 3d. to 8s. per cwt.

Provisions.—There is a moderate inquiry for good and fine qualities of butter, at full prices. Inferior parcels rule somewhat heavy, at the late decline in value. Bacon is steady, but no dearer. In other provisions very little is passing.

Tallow.—The demand is steady, at 58s. to 58s. 3d. for P.Y.C. on the spot, and 56s. per cwt., April to June.

Oils.—Linseed oil has found buyers to a fair extent at 27s. 6d. to 27s. 9d. per cwt. All other oils are a dull inquiry. American spirits of turpentine have advanced to 36s. per cwt.

Spirits.—We have very little change to notice in the value of rum, and sales are somewhat restricted. Brandy commands very little attention, at about previous rates. Grain spirit is dull.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay £2 10s. to £4 4s.; clover ditto, £3 10s. to £5 5s.; and straw, £1 5s. to £1 10s. per load. Trade steady.

Hops (Friday).—The amount of business doing in all new hops—the show of which is very moderate—is less extensive; nevertheless, prices are supported. In yearlings and old hops the transactions are somewhat limited. Mid and East Kent pockets, 86s. to 150s.; Weald of Kent ditto, 66s. to 90s.; Sussex ditto, 62s. to 82s. per cwt.

Metropolitan Cattle Market, Thursday, Jan. 19.—To-day's market was moderately supplied with beasts, in fair average condition. Most breeds met a dull inquiry, at a decline in the quotations realised on Monday of 2d. per 8lb. Sheep, though in short supply, changed hands slowly, at the late reduction in value. The top figure for Downs was 5s. 4d. per 8lb. We were rather scantily supplied with calves, and the veal trade ruled firm, at very full currencies. In the value of pigs and milch cows no change took place. Per 8 lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 2d. to 3s. 4d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 6d. to 4s. 0d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.; prime Scots, &c., 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 6d. to 4s. 0d.; second quality ditto, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.; prime coarse-woolled sheep, 4s. 8d. to 4s. 10d.; prime Southdown ditto, 5s. 0d. to 5s. 4d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 8d. to 5s. 2d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 4d. to 5s. 8d.; large hogs, 3s. 6d. to 3s. 10d.; neat small porkers, 4s. 0d. to 4s. 10d.; suckling calves, 18s. to 22s.; and quarter-old store pigs, 22s. to 29s. each. VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.

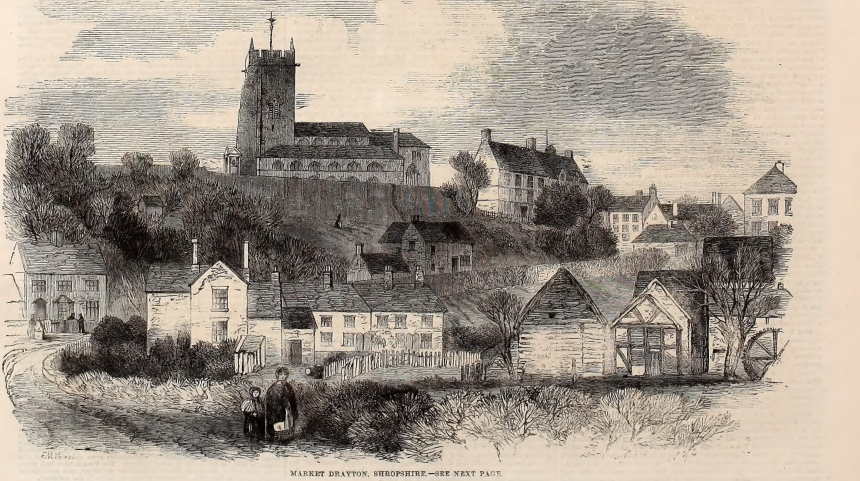
A RECURRENCE at any length to the history of the Lord Palmerston of the past would nowadays tend rather towards a work of supererogation. As a statesman and as a man he has been so prominently before the public eye, at least from 1830 up to the present moment, that most of the dates and facts connected with his career must be familiar to nearly all persons in this country, and, looking to his diplomatic antecedents, to a great many abroad also. What books it is to tell that he was born in 1784, leaving the delicate calculation of how old that makes him to individual curiosity; that he was educated at Harrow, and St. John's College, Cambridge; first sat in Parliament in 1806; was Secretary at War from 1809 to 1828; Secretary for Foreign Affairs from November, 1830, to November, 1834, from April, 1835, to September, 1841, and from July, 1846, to December, 1851; was Home Secretary from December, 1852, to March, 1855, when he became First Lord of the Treasury, which office he held until February, 1857, when he resigned, and was re-instated in July last! All this and more has been duly chronicled and discussed from every point of view, at all times, and under all circumstances. What we have chiefly to do with at the present moment is the striking fact that he has been raised to an office which, if one may judge from the sidelong evidence of a public life of unusual extent, was the last thing to which he aspired. The Premiership has been in one instance certainly rather thrust upon him than deliberately or anxiously sought by him. From time to time various have been the estimates formed of his ability, and diverse have been the judgments on his political and diplomatic acts. But we believe it to be a fact that none of his misdoubters individually, or as a body, ever came in actual contact with Lord Palmerston but they acknowledged, if not in so many words, yet practically and in result, that he was a power, though whence he derived or in what precise shape he showed that he was so, was not quite so easy of divination. No doubt one great element of his success has been the heartiness of his nature and his buoyant good humour. These qualities, combined with a wonderful physique and an excellent constitution, have enabled him to get through an amount of work and to achieve a position second to few, if any, of his political predecessors, and still less to that of any contemporary statesmen. It would be absurd to deny to Lord Palmerston the possession of great talents. No man has made more brilliant speeches, and yet he is in no sense an orator; and at moments (his mode of dealing with the House of Commons at the beginning of 1857 occurs to one) it has been doubtful whether he is a perfect debater. If he chooses, however, he can assume that character with dexterity and skill; and beyond all question he has reaped that reward which every important public man is sure to secure at some time or the other, if he devotes himself to the House of Commons. He is a moving power in that assemblage. Perhaps it may not, on the first blush, seem like a compliment, but we are inclined to believe that one of the main elements of his success is that he is essentially a man of the time. That he has opinions of his own is not to be doubted, but he believes in public opinion as a principle, to which individuality must yield; and he has expressed that belief in words which have become nearly proverbial.

During his tenure of office since last year, or at least up to the present moment, Lord Palmerston has seemed to shrink from giving himself undue prominence. In his former Premiership he stood so much alone that probably his ostentatiousness was in a manner forced upon him. Now, surrounded by men who can hold their own, and who not only profess to be but are statesmen and administrators, as contradistinguished from elaborated clerks, the nature of his labours must have changed, and his skill in governing men and guiding the State be more severely tried. Nevertheless it is possible to trace his influence in all that we can divine in the policy of his Cabinet; and no doubt when Parliament meets we shall find him still displaying, though necessarily in a modified degree, his old readiness, watchfulness, and persistence in attendance on the long sittings of the House of Commons which so eminently distinguished him in his first Premiership. Still we hear it occasionally whispered, how are the labours and the responsibilities of his high functions compatible with the time of life at which he has arrived? In reference to this subject it may be mentioned that the writer of these lines chanced to be present at a dinner given to the then Ministry by the Lord Mayor of London at Easter, 1854, at which Lord Palmerston attended, looking the impersonation of health and vigour, dining with gusto, and making speeches with spirit and vivacity. Within two or three seats of him sat a white-haired, pale, wrinkled, bent old man, who was stated to be a diplomatist who had spent many years in the tranquil far niente life of Naples, who looked as much the impersonation of natural decay as Lord Palmerston was the representation of merely advanced manhood. This gentleman was Sir William Temple, the younger brother of Lord Palmerston by four years, and who dropped into the grave now four years ago. Again, in the autumn of last year it was the fortune of this present writer to witness the emergence of the turning of the first turf of a new railway by Lord Palmerston on the confines of his own park at Romsey. On that occasion his Lordship addressed a crowd of two or three thousand persons in the open air, and made them hear too; and afterwards delivered three or four long and energetic speeches under the equal disadvantage of speaking to a large number of persons assembled under the canvas of a gigantic marquee. With this testimony to the present physical preservation of the noble Lord we will close this notice which accompanies the Portrait we have engraved in our Journal this week, only adding our conviction that the country in an especial manner needs the services of Lord Palmerston at the present moment, and therefore we trust that he will for some time yet be enabled to afford them.



STATUE OF ROBERT LORD CLIVE AND BARON PLASSEY, INAUGURATED AT SHREWSBURY ON WEDNESDAY.

THE CLIVE TESTIMONIAL.

A STATUE of the illustrious warrior and statesman Robert Lord Clive was inaugurated in Market-square, Shrewsbury, on Wednesday, by Earl Stanhope. The committee met in the Guildhall shortly before one o'clock, and there received Earl Stanhope, the Lord Lieutenant of the county, the Secretary of State for India, and the other noblemen and gentlemen promoting this national testimonial; and then proceeded to the foot of the pedestal, where the statue was presented by Earl Stanhope to the Mayor and Corporation of the borough—the bands of the Shropshire Militia and of the South Salopian Yeomanry Cavalry being in attendance, and playing the National Anthem. The day was kept as a general holiday in Shrewsbury.

The statue, in bronze, is by Marochetti. It is remarkable for ease of posture, and the characteristic firmness of the man is expressed not only in the countenance, but in every line of the composition. It stands on a pedestal nine feet high, and occupies a commanding position in Market-square. The statue was raised by a public subscription entered into a year ago to commemorate the centenary of Clive's great victory and the final triumph of the British arms in India. We annex a few particulars of the life of this extraordinary man.

Robert Clive was born in 1725, and in his nineteenth year went to India as a writer, but soon quitted that employment for the Army. Being intrusted with the attack of Devicottah, a fort of the Rajah of Tanjore, he performed this important duty so well that he was shortly afterwards made commissary. The French having artfully obtained considerable territory in the Carnatic, Clive advised that an attack should be made on the city of Arcot, which being intrusted to him, a complete victory was obtained. This unexpected victory drew off the French from Trichinopoly, which they were then besieging, to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that they were compelled to raise the siege. This was followed by a series of victories; and in 1753 he embarked for England, where he received a valuable present from the East India Company, and was raised to the rank of Lieutenant-

MARKET DRAYTON, SHROPSHIRE.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

Colonel in the King's service. After a short stay in England for the benefit of his health he returned to India, and was shortly called upon to march to Calcutta, of which the Nabob Surajah Dowlah had taken possession. He was again successful, and, perceiving that there could be no permanent peace obtained until the Nabob was dethroned, he made the necessary arrangements, and in the famous battle of Plassey put the Nabob completely to the rout, and established the power of the English more firmly than it had ever before been. As Governor of Calcutta, Lord Clive performed great services, both civil and military; and when he returned to England he was raised to the Peerage by the titles of Lord Clive and Baron Plassey. He once more visited India, but was called upon only for civil measures, which he undertook with his usual sagacity. In 1767 he returned to England, having done more to extend the English territory and consolidate the English power in India than any previous commander. But the large wealth he had acquired during his long and arduous services exposed him to an accusation in the House of Commons of having abused his power. The charge fell to the ground, but it had the effect of injuring his mind so deeply that he committed suicide in 1774.

MARKET DRAYTON.

DRAYTON-IN-HALES, or Market Drayton, one of the principal towns of North Shropshire, is pleasantly situated on the River Tern, on the confines of Cheshire and Staffordshire, and contains some good houses, hotels, and public buildings; but the streets are narrow and irregular, and the absence of gas in the streets and want of railway accommodation are great disadvantages. The town contains two churches. The parish church (the one taken in the Sketch) is supposed to have been erected, with the exception of the steeple, in the reign of Stephen, and contains several monuments, one of which was erected by public subscription in 1858 to the memory of Lieut. C. H. L. Warren, of the 8th Bengal Native Infantry, who fell in the relief of Lucknow, under the gallant Sir Henry Havelock. The new church is situated at Little Drayton, and was erected by subscription in 1846. The town contains a good Free Grammar School, founded, in the reign of Philip and Mary, by Sir Rowland Hill, the first Protestant Lord Mayor of London. It was at this school (the house immediately to the right of the church in the Engraving) that the great Lord Clive was partly educated, having been born at the Styche, a country mansion about two miles from Drayton, now the residence of R. H. and H. B. Clive, Esqrs., sons of the younger brother of the great Lord Clive. Some lineaments of the character of the man were early discerned in Clive. Letters written by his relations when he was in his seventh year remain, which show that even at this early age his strong will and fiery passions had begun to develop themselves. "Fighting," says one of his uncles, "to which he is out of measure addicted, gives his temper such a fierceness and imperiousness that he flies out on every trifling occasion." The old people of the neighbourhood still remember to have heard from their parents how Bob Clive climbed up to the top of the lofty steeple of Market Drayton, and with what terror the inhabitants saw him seated on a stone spout near the summit. They also relate how he formed all the idle lads of the town into a kind of predatory army, and compelled the shopkeepers to submit to a tribute of apples and halfpence, in consideration of which he guaranteed the security of their windows.

Drayton is supposed to have been the Caer Draithon of the ancient Britons, and one of their principal towns. About two miles from this town a sanguinary battle was fought between the houses of York and Lancaster, in which the latter was defeated.

HIS HOLINESS POPE PIUS IX.

AT the present moment, in reference to the impending Congress, his Holiness Pope Pius IX. occupies so prominent a position in the eyes of the public, both in England and on the Continent, that our readers will be glad of some account of the personal career of one who has played in his day a chief part in the political drama of Europe, and whose line of conduct now will materially influence the course which events are likely to assume during the present year, and give the key-note to European politics for many years to come.

Before proceeding to our personal biography of Pius IX.—whose Portrait, from a photograph taken very recently in Rome, we have this week the pleasure of placing before our readers—it will be desirable to say, by way of preface, a few words about the position which his Holiness holds as occupier of the Papal throne.

The Government of the Roman Catholic Church is essentially monarchical, inasmuch as the Pope is held in it to be the ruler over the entire Christian world, and the most distant Bishop holds his appointment from him and receives from him the authority intrusted to his hands. The dignity or office of Pope, or Father of the Faithful—for such is the meaning of the term—is inherent in the occupant of the see of Rome, because the supremacy over the Universal Church is believed to be held by him in virtue of a commission given by Christ to St. Peter, not as his personal prerogative, but as a part of the Constitution of the Church and for its permanent benefit, and, therefore, intended to descend to his successors. The election of the Pope devolves upon the clergy of Rome, as being their Bishop; and it is confided to what is termed "the Sacred College," or body of Cardinals, who, bearing the titles of the oldest churches in Rome, represent its clergy, and form their chapter or electoral body. The meeting or chapter formed for this purpose alone is called a Conclave. The Cardinals, in their turn, are severally appointed by the Pope, and compose the Executive Council of the Church. They preside over the various departments of the Government of the Roman States and of the Church at large, and are divided into boards or congregations, as they are called, for the transaction of business from all parts of the world, though every decision is subject to the Pope's revision, and has no value except from his approval and ratification. On some occasions the Cardinals are all summoned to meet his Holiness on affairs of the highest importance, such as for the nomination of new Bishops or for the admission of new members into their own body. Such an assembly is then called a Consistory. The full number of Cardinals is seventy-two, but there are always some hats left vacant.

There are three offices or dignities joined together in the Roman Pontiff, separable in thought but especially united in fact, by reason of the union of the spiritual and temporal power in his person. He is, firstly, the Primate or spiritual head of the Roman Catholic world; secondly, he is Bishop of Rome and Metropolitan of that province; thirdly, he is the temporal Sovereign of the Papal States. As we are not entering upon a theological disquisition, it is mainly in this last-mentioned capacity that we are concerned to speak of him now.

Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti, who now rules the Roman Catholic Church as 259th successor of St. Peter, under the title of Pius IX., is a member of a noble Italian family, and was born at Sinigaglia, in the Marches of Ancona, on the 13th of May, 1792, so that he is now in his sixty-eighth year. It is said that in early youth he was distinguished by a remarkable sweetness of disposition, and for active charity beyond his years. A work on the "First Year of his Pontificate," published some years since, informs us that when he was quite a child he was one day rescued from a watery grave by a poor contadino, who lived to see him inherit what Macaulay admitted to be the most ancient throne in Europe. At the age of eighteen young Ferretti went to Rome, with the intention of entering the body guard of Pope Pius VII., but an epileptic seizure disabled him from entering upon any kind of military service. The writer of a sketch of his career which appears in "Men of the Time" asserts that a matrimonial disappointment led him to exchange the idea of a soldier's life for that of an ecclesiastic. The truer account, as we learn from one of Cardnial Wiseman's lectures, is that upon this seizure the reigning Pontiff, remarking in him signs of superior ability, ordered him to make what is called a "novena," or nine days' supplication, for the recovery of his health, and for Divine guidance in choosing his future vocation. He did so; his health was restored, and with its recovery came the resolution of taking holy orders. He accordingly entered a religious seminary, the head of which was so struck by his meekness and piety that he declared his belief that he was "rearing in him a tender plant which would one day grow into a great Pope." In due course of time he was admitted into the priesthood, and first exercised his spiritual functions as Chaplain in the Hospital of Tata Giovanni, an educational institute for orphans at Rome, founded by a poor citizen for the benefit of his poorer brethren.

From this quiet sphere of duty Ferretti was called away by the Pope, and sent out to South America as auditor to Monsignore Mugi, Vicar Apostolic of Chili. Whilst thus engaged his mind was not inactive; it is said that in Southern America he gained a deep insight into the political arrangements of foreign States and the conduct of diplomatic affairs; and that this study led him to systematise in writing his opinions on the amelioration of the Italian Government, intending to bequeath them at his decease to the occupant of the Papal throne.

Returning to Europe, he found the chair of St. Peter filled by Leo XII., who appointed him Prelate of his househould, and President of the Great Hospital of St. Michael, on the Ripa Grande. Whilst holding this important post he employed himself mainly by preaching sermons and "retreats," and in educating the Roman youth of the poorer classes, to whom he devoted himself most assiduously.

In 1829, when in his thirty-eighth year, he was raised to the archbishopric of Spoleto, from which see he was transferred in December, 1832, to that of Imola, where, in consequence of symptoms of disaffection and revolution appearing at Romagna, it was thought that his personal character and influence would be well calculated to allay the excitement of the populace. Whilst here, forgetting that "charity begins at home," his purse and his personal goods were placed by him at the disposal of the poor to such an extent that his steward often knew not how to provide for the wants of the archiepiscopal household.

In 1840 he was elevated to the dignity of a Cardinal by the title of SS. Peter et Marcellinus; and it is said that the only occasion on which he ever quitted his diocese was that of his compulsory visit to Rome to receive his Cardinal's hat. In the last year of his episcopate he warmly exerted himself to procure the establishment in his diocese of a branch of the Convent of the Good Shepherd, and had the gratification of seeing the work commenced by four sisters sent to Imola from Angers to found that institution.

Our readers will remember that Pope Gregory XVI. died on the 1st of June, 1846. The Archbishop was summoned to Rome, whilst preaching a "retreat," to attend the solemn conclave of the Sacred College, held for the purpose of electing a successor to the Papal chair. The first ballot (for the voting is secret) being unsuccessful, as no candidate had a sufficient number of votes, a second reckoning of votes took place, and Cardinal Ferretti, who was one of the scrutators, found a majority (thirty-five votes) recorded in his favour. He was proclaimed Pope at once, under the title of Pius IX., and solemly crowned on the 21st of the same month at St. Peter's.

The state of civil affairs in the Papal Provinces on the accession of Pius IX. was as unpromising as can well be conceived. The financial department was on the very verge of bankruptcy; the system of taxation was at once heavy and capricious, and involved several offensive monopolies. The higher civil offices of the State, wholly filled by ecclesiastics, were greatly overpaid, whilst the inferior ones were left to take their chance; high posts were bought and sold; the army was entirely composed of mercenaries; peculation was carried on upon a large scale; civilians were excluded from all share in political affairs, and (of course) the very idea of representation or representative government was unknown. Some attempt to remedy the existing state of things in the Papal States had been made by Pope Gregory XVI., and a scheme of administrative reform had been proposed by the five Powers, when the civil disturbances of 1830 and 1831 compelled them to be set aside for a time. It is said that when Pope Pius came to his throne in 1846 he found no less than 2000 of his subjects in exile or prison for political offences, the censorship of the press most rigid, learned societies discouraged, and the meeting of all clubs and societies forbidden; the result, be it remembered, not only of ecclesiastical rule, but of Austrian interference, rendered more intolerable by its jealousy of all improvements, civil and social, among the people whom it oppressed and defended.

Such was the state of things in June, 1846. His Holiness had not forgotten the lessons of political economy which he had learned and committed to writing when he was in South America, and he resolved to put them into execution. His first step was a most happy one—he granted a general amnesty to all political offenders, requiring as the sole condition of pardon a solemn declaration of loyalty. Under a decree, dated July 18, the exiled returned to their country, and the prisoners were set free. The general ecstasy of the people showed how widely spread was their desire for administrative changes and reforms, and the name of Pio Nono became everywhere the watchword of peace and joy.

A Roman Catholic contemporary publication in January, 1848, remarks on this subject:—"Had Pius IX. been cut off now, at the beginning of his career, history, perhaps, might doubt whether he was not another Louis XVI. But he has now shown to the world a character at once simple and many-sided, of which the Bourbon sweetness and passive courage constitute only one single phase. He has been sent not only to abolish evil, but to build up good. His work has not been so much destruction as institution. Were he to die to-morrow his year's Pontificate will have left to the Papal States, either in actual working or in germ, a native military organisation, a reformed prison discipline, a tolerant policy towards the Jews, a mitigated censorship of the press, the admission of civilians to political functions, an admirably-adapted municipal council for the city of Rome; a grand Council of State, representing the whole of the Papal provinces; a better-regulated system of taxation; the introduction of railways throughout the country; a customs union with other Italian States, which will destroy those local animosities so ruinous to Italy, and lay the basis of a new era for commerce; and, lastly, the principle of Italian nationality and independence. If we speak of other nations—to the Christians of the East, languishing under the careless eye of France, he has given an efficient protector; to Jerusalem, a Catholic Patriarch; the idea of a reference to the Pope was, at least, not derided by the haughty Diet of Switzerland; a Papal Nuncio is now residing at Washington; a British Ambassador will soon be residing at Rome. For Ireland Pius IX. has asserted the principle of a Christian education—for England he has created a Catholic hierarchy."

Eloquent words indeed, but how soon to be falsified by the course of events which followed! Within two months from the publication of those words the French Revolution of 1848 had resulted in the expulsion of Louis Philippe from the throne of France, and the spirit of Republicanism had spread like wildfire over the great part of the continent of Europe. The European thrones, one and all, felt the shock, and some trembled to their base. His Holiness believed that he had constructed a Government which would fully satisfy the cravings of the nation for reform, while it enabled him to keep in check the democratic party. But the excitable populace over which he held sway, or at all events their leading spirits, were not satisfied with the reforms conceded. The conscience and feelings of Pius IX. revolted, however, from sudden and organic changes; and though, as a reformer and a lover of national independence, he would, probably, have been glad to dismiss his Austrian Guards and throw himself upon his own people, yet the menacing attitude assumed by the latter precluded the possibility of such a step. The sequel is well known to our readers, and needs but to be briefly repeated here. The scene which occurred at the opening of the Chamber of Deputies; the assassination of the Papal Minister, Count Rossi; the arming of the people of Rome, their collision with the Swiss Guards, the detention of the Pope as a prisoner within his own palace, and his refusal to sanction the acts of the Republican Ministry that had usurped the reins of government;—all these things are fresh in our readers' memories; and it is enough to say that the Ambassadors of France and Spain both offered his Holiness a safe refuge in their respective countries, but that he refused to depart further from the seat of his government than was absolutely necessary for his personal safety. Accordingly, after effecting his escape from Rome in disguise, he took up his abode at Gaëta, a small town on the frontier of the Neapolitan territory.

Three days after his arrival there he sent to Rome a decree annulling all the acts of the existing Government, and superseding it by a State Commission. For eighteen months Pius IX. continued to live in exile at Gaëta and Portici, near Naples, when, escorted by Neapolitan troops, and amidst the thunder of French cannon, he returned to the city of Rome, April 14, 1850.

A very few months had passed by after the restoration of Pius IX. to Rome when his Holiness took upon himself the responsibility of making that organic change in the administration of the Roman Catholic affairs in England which will be generally known in history as the "Papal Aggression," and which has had no one single effect beyond that of gratifying the personal ambition of Cardinal Wiseman, fanning into life again the dying embers of religious strife, and placing our Roman Catholic countrymen in an attitude of marked hostility to the rest of the nation.

As Pope, his Holiness was induced to condemn the colleges founded by her Majesty's Government in Ireland for the purpose of educating the Roman Catholic and Protestant population on equal terms, and without offending the prejudices of either creed. He also took an active part in promoting the establishment of the new Roman Catholic University in Dublin, which, till recently, has been under the supervision of the Rev. Dr. Newman, formerly of Oriel College, Oxford. At Rome his Holiness has founded and endowed at his own cost a college called after his own name for the purpose of offering a course of ecclesiastical training to such among the English Protestant clergy and laity as, having "seceded" from the Established Church, desire to be admitted into Roman Catholic orders. The name of Pope Pius IX. will also long be remembered for the definition of the Roman Catholic dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which was publicly announced in St. Peter's on December 8, 1854, with great solemnity, and in the presence of Roman Catholic prelates from all the four quarters of the world.

The triumphal progress of Pope Pius through the Papal States in the summer of 1858, and the rejoicings with which he was everywhere greeted on his way, will go far to prove that he is personally a benevolent and beneficent Sovereign, and that the abuses and drawbacks in the Papal administration, which cause so much dissatisfaction and disaffection in the States of the Church, are the results of the stagnating influence produced by the ecclesiastical system of government, and which places an all but hopeless barrier in the way of those improvements, both political and social, which his Holiness would perhaps gladly inaugurate.

THE INDUSTRY AND TRADE OF FRANCE.

LETTER FROM THE EMPEROR.

THE Moniteur of Sunday contains the following letter addressed to the Minister of State:—

"Palace of the Tuileries, Jan. 5.

"Monsieur le Ministre,—Notwithstanding the uncertainty that still prevails on certain points of foreign policy, a pacific solution may confidently be foreseen. The moment has therefore arrived for occupying ourselves with the means of giving a great stimulus to the several branches of the national wealth.

"I address to you with this object the bases of a programme, several parts of which will have to receive the approbation of the Chambers, and upon which you will concert with your colleagues in order to prepare the measures best adapted to give agriculture, industry, and commerce a lively impulse.

"The truth has been long proclaimed, that the means of exchange must be multiplied in order to render commerce flourishing; that without competition industry remains stationary, and keeps up high prices, which are opposed to increase of consumption; that without a prosperous industry to develop capital agriculture itself remains in a state of infancy. There is a general connection, then, in the successive development of the elements of public prosperity. But the essential question is to know within what limits the State ought to favour these several interests, and what order of preference it ought to grant to each of them.

"Therefore, before developing our foreign trade by the exchange of produce, our agriculture must be improved and our industry freed from all the internal fetters that place it in a state of inferiority. At present, not only are our great undertakings impeded by a host of restrictive regulations, but even the welfare of those who labour is far from having attained the development it has in a neighbouring country. It is, then, only a general system of good political economy that can, by creating national wealth, distribute competency among the working class.

"Regarding agriculture, it must be made to participate in the benefits of banking institutions, to clear away forests situated in plains, to replant the mountains with trees, to lay out every year a considerable sum on great works of drainage, irrigation, and tillage. These works, by transforming waste lands into cultivated grounds, will enrich the communes without impoverishing the State, which will get back its advances by the sale of a part of those lands restored to agriculture.

"To encourage industrial production it is necessary to free from all duty the raw materials indispensable to industry, and to lend it, exceptionally and at a moderate percentage, as has been already done to agriculture for drainage, the capital that will assist it in perfecting its material.

"One of the greatest services to be rendered to the country is to facilitate the carriage of materials absolutely required by agriculture and industry; to this end, the Minister of Public Works will cause to be made as promptly as possible ways of communication, canals, roads, and railways, which will have for their special object the conveyance of coal and manures to the spots where the needs of production demand them, and he will endeavour to reduce the tariffs, whilst establishing a fair rivalry between the canals and the railways.

"The encouragement to commerce through the multiplication of the means of exchange will then come as the natural consequence of the preceding measures. The gradual reduction of the tax upon provisions of general consumption will then be a necessity, as well as the substitution of protective duties for the prohibitive system, which limits our commercial relations.

"By these measures agriculture will find a market for its produce; industry, being released from its internal shackles, assisted by the Government, stimulated by competition, will contend advantageously with foreign products, and our trade, instead of languishing, will take a fresh spring.

"Desirous before everything that order shall be maintained in our finances, this is how, without disturbing their equilibrium, these improvements may be obtained:—

"The conclusion of the peace has permitted the total amount of the loan not to be exhausted. A considerable balance remains disposable, which, joined to other resources, reaches about 160 millions. In demanding the authorisation of the Corps Legislatif to apply this sum to great public works, and in dividing it into three annuities, there would be about 50 millions a year to add to the considerable sums already assigned annually to the budget.

"This extraordinary resource will facilitate for us not only the prompt completion of the railways, canals, navigable routes, roads, and harbours, but it will also enable us to repair our cathedrals, our churches, and worthily to encourage the sciences, letters, and arts.

"To compensate the loss that the treasury will momentarily experience by the reduction of the duties on the raw materials and articles of general consumption as food, our budget offers the resource of the sinking fund, which may be suspended until the public revenue, raised by the increase of trade, shall permit the fund in question to come into operation again.

"Thus, to sum up:—Suppression of the duties on wool and cottons; gradual reduction on sugars and coffees; improvement energetically carried out of the routes of communication; reduction of charges on the canals, and consequently a general diminution of the prices of conveyance; loans to agriculture and industry; considerable works of public utility; suppression of prohibitions; treaties of commerce with foreign Powers.

"Such are the general bases of the programme to which I beg you to direct the attention of your colleagues, who will have to prepare without delay the projects of law destined to realise it. It will obtain, I am firmly convinced, the patriotic support of the Senate and the Corps Legislatif, both jealously desirous of inaugurating with me a new era of peace and of securing its benefits to France.

"Whereupon I pray God to have you in his holy keeping.

"NAPOLEON."

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY BETWEEN AMERICA AND CHINA.—By the recently-ratified treaty between America and China, American commerce will be only benefited by a trifling reduction of tonnage duties. The new tariff of duties will not be adopted till the existing difficulties with the British and French Governments are arranged. That accomplished, then the Americans will enter into possession of all the advantages accruing to the successful belligerents under the favoured-nation clause of their treaty.

THE VICTORIA RAILWAY LOAN.—The Government of the colony of Victoria have given notice, through the London committee of the six associated Australian banks, contractors for the Victoria Railway loan, that the sum required during the present year will again be £3,000,000, and that the tenders for the whole will be received in April next. It is understood, however, that a portion is intended to discharge the claims of the persons interested in the Geelong and Melbourne Railway, amounting to about £700,000, and chiefly held in this country, while the greater part of the remainder will be disbursed here for railway materials.

THE FRENCH AT MADAGASCAR.—A Mauritius journal states that the French have effected a permanent settlement at Bally, on the east coast of Madagascar. The place is part of an outlying province independent of the Hova Queen, who reigns in the centre of the island, and is Suzerain of the other three tribes. The attempt of the French to settle in 1642 miserably failed. Some of them were massacred, owing, as usual, to the Jesuits, and the rest fled to the Mauritius, where La Bourdonna introduced order and prosperity. The English missionaries were driven out of the island in 1825, on the death of King Radama. The French have had, since 1815, a factory on the small island of Madame St. Mary, and settlements at four spots on the coast. Bourbon is only 440 miles to the eastward.

The following well-contested game was played last week in a little tournament for books, arranged for members of the Metropolitan Chess Club. In this game Black, Mr. Deacon, gives his opponent, Mr. Schröder, the Pawn and Move at starting.

THE FARM.

Almost simultaneously with the Moniteur manifesto, we learn that a great General and National Agricultural Exhibition will be held in Paris, from the 17th to the 22nd of June. The horses and cattle are divided into 27 categories, with 308 prizes; sheep into 8 categories, with 124; pigs into 3, with 38; goats and rabbits into 2, with 9; and poultry into 25, with 85. Farm servants who have distinguished themselves, and produce to come in for gold, silver, and bronze medals. Altogether the festival promises to be a valuable incorporation of the golden age which the Emperor has endeavoured to foreshadow, and we can only wish that the long-promised Universal Agricultural Exposition of 1856, at which our breeders figured so triumphantly, will be repeated in 1861. From the latter we have no particular news this week, except that a Third Grand Medal of Honour has arrived at last. Shorthorn men would unconmonly like to see this splendid bull in the All-aged class at Canterbury, but we fear that there is no chance of their being gratified.

An important arbitration case has just been going on respecting the injury done by rabbits on Ilderton Dod, a valuable stock farm on the Cheviots. The plaintiff's estimate of his loss by their depredations, between November 1857, and November 1858, was 4732 10s., which was principally made up by calculations of the depreciation in the value of sheep, lambs, and wool, and in the expense of putting them on hired keep in the winter. It was deposed that the rabbits had come more than twice as many as that the twenty tons of hay on one meadow had been cut, that the sheep, especially clipped 12lb. per fleece less; and that a great many sheep had been lost from heavy snows, caused by the rabbits. On the other side it was asserted that everything in the keepers' power had been done to kill the rabbits, and that during the season 3000 had been killed. The arbitrator awarded £90, and the expenses of the reference (£14) is to be shared by the parties.

Apropos of hemp, the Edinburgh Veterinary Review for the present month has some very judicious remarks, and we trust that whenever the wrong moment arises for the subject, he will turn his eyes to whether the disease is attributable in any measure to a rabbit invasion. The Royal sign-manual has been given to the new Veterinary College at Edinburgh, of which the Principal Director is the eminent Professor John Gamgee, the principal, and thirty-nine students are at present attending the classes.

We have met with some curious accounts of the "great turkey manufactory" at Swaffham, which must make the good dames of Norfolk and Cambridgeshire, and those of the sunless Pas-de-Calais, hate (one of whom we observed looking after her gobbling charges last summer and attending to them with crochet-work in hand) to prick up their ears with amazement. The proprietors of it are R. and S. Bentley, Wells-next-the-Sea, Norfolk, New York. They bring at least 2000 turkeys a year into the market; and, as each of them averages 15lb.; it seems that they have turned out at least "30,000lb. of turkey-meat per annum" for the present market. This fact has already made some of the American farmers fall to thinking whether it will not be more profitable in the future to make up more poultry and fewer pigs with their grain.

Devons are a very favourite stock with them, and Mr. Wainwright, of "The Farm" on the banks of the Genesee, is amongst the foremost as a breeder. He was a pupil of Mr. George Turner, and procured the original stock that gained him renown, on the high ground between the Quartley, Davy, and Morson herds. Mr. Wainright seems quite the Townsley of America, as in ten years he has taken no less than fifty-three premiums for Devons. Mr. Turner's Omar Pasha, the only Royal first-prize Devon that ever crossed the Atlantic, at Windsor in 1855; but the Americans vow that he is not to be compared to the Meadows-bred Horicon, a son of Turner's May Boy. Mr. Wainwright bought from his old preceptor to begin with. A considerable amount is brought up in that country for Devons to go to Mississippi and other Southern States: several of them have recently been sent to Australia and California; and it is thought that on the black soil of the prairies, where speed is more a point than strength or weight, they "the juicy reds," with their sloping, horse-like shoulders, will whip everything at plough.

THE NAVAL RESERVE FORCE.

The English people and the Government, being resolved that this country shall not be caught napping by any invading force, have taken active measures for the formation of a "fighting naval man." Hence the rifle corps which have sprung and are springing everywhere into existence, and hence the military and naval reserve forces. The latter scheme came into operation with the new year. Circulars relating to it have been sent by the Board of Trade, under whose supervision the central register is kept, to those who have been received. The Peninsular and Oriental Company have invited their seamen to enrol themselves in the force, and have given to every eight days' drill while their ships are staying in port, and thus secure to the men a very short time forgoing their wages, if the juicy rele," with their sloping, horse-like shoulders, will whip everything at plough.

engagement. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have also promised that the volunteer reserve of seamen will become a settled part of the institutions of the country.

Any British subject, under thirty-five years of age, subject to no incapacitating disease or infirmity, having within ten years previous to his joining the reserve been at sea, and for not less than three years as an able-bodied seaman, is qualified to join the reserve. The inducements held out to him are—first, the sum of £8 per annum, payable quarterly; and a donation of not less than £12 per annum whenever he shall become incapacitated from earning his livelihood, or when he shall have attained sixty years. The duties which he will be called upon to perform in consideration of these rewards are—first, that he shall attend drill during twenty-eight days in the year, at such time as may suit his own business or in the merchant service, the time and place of such drill should, as far as public convenience will allow, be at those places most convenient to himself; that, if he desire to take a voyage which is likely to occupy more than a longer period, he shall obtain special permission for that purpose; that he shall report himself to some shipping master at some port of Great Britain or Ireland once every six months, and shall not proceed out to stay abroad for a longer time. It cannot be denied that these advantages are very tempting, especially to the young sailor who may necessity should arise for calling out the Volunteers, or for their employment in actual service. Nor do the advantages end even there; for during the twenty-eight days of drill the seamen will receive the same pay, victualling, and allowances as a seaman of the best, besides which they will receive a gratuity of one month's pay. Should war arise, or any such prospect or danger of war as shall necessitate an increase to the calling out of the Reserves, each seaman previously enrolled will receive the same pay, allowance, and victualling, and have the same prospect of promotion and prize-money, as a coadjutor in the service of the country; and when he is ship, receive the same clothing, bedding, and mess-traps. If wounded or injured in active service, he will be entitled to a pension and the regular seaman of the Navy of the same rating, and will be eligible to all the advantages of the Coast Guard service, and of Greenwich Hospital.

We have engraved on the next page a group of recruits for her Majesty's Naval Reserve Force.

CRUELTY ON BOARD AN AMERICAN SHIP.—On Monday the adjourned inquest was resumed at the Wellington Tavern, Cannon-street, St. George's-in-the-East, respecting the death of John Craven, aged thirty-five years, a seaman, lately employed on board an American ship named the Wizard King, at present lying in the import basin of the Victoria Docks, North Woolwich, who, it was alleged, had died from starvation and cruelty while on a voyage from Bombay to the port of London. The jury returned the following special verdict:—"That the deceased died from exhaustion on board the American ship Wizard King, and the jurors are of opinion that the deceased was grossly and cruelly neglected by the officers and commander of the said vessel; and the said jurors further say that the food given to the deceased was neither good in quality nor sufficient in quantity."

UNIFORM FOR VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS RECOMMENDED FOR GENERAL ADOPTION BY THE WAR-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

THE controversy which was carried on with so much spirit at the beginning of the Crimean war as to what a soldier ought or ought not to wear, and when tunics gained the victory over coatees, has broken out with redoubled spirit since the organisation of the volunteer rifle corps. Invisibility of colour, belts that will never require cleaning, and pouches that will hang on by atmospheric adhesion seem to be the objects most desirable of attainment at the present time. As yet, however, no Columbus has arisen to set the egg on end by suggesting that, should our volunteers ever be called into action, a blouse thrown over the uniform would answer all the purposes sought for in neutrality of colour.

The uniform at present most in favour with the authorities is the one represented in our Engraving. The cap, tunic, and trousers are of a light-brownish grey; the tunic is edged with black braid, having a piping of red. The cap is trimmed with green cord, and has a piece of elastic of the same colour at each side to make it fit easy. The trousers are an exaggerated pegtop, with a narrow cord of red down the sides. When tucked into the gaiters they form knickerbockers. The belts, pouch, and ball-bag are of a brown-red leather; the belts rather narrow.

Although this uniform is recommended by the authorities as the cheapest and most convenient, albeit not the most becoming, its adoption is not insisted on each corps being still in possession of its former independence as to choice of costume, subject, of course, to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant of the county.

The pattern suits recommended by the committee are deposited at the War Office, where they can be seen, and coloured drawings may be had, upon application on and after the 24th instant. They have been already adopted, with some modifications, by several of the metropolitan corps, by the Inns of Court, by all the Westminster corps, and, with an admixture of plaid, by the Scottish. Some of the new corps, however, repudiate it, the Wellington (Victoria Park) Rifles having selected a uniform almost similar to the Victorias; and the London Irish Rifles have chosen Sardinian grey, richly braided with thick silver cord.

FEARFUL SHIPWRECK.—EIGHT HUNDRED AND FIFTY LIVES LOST.

VAGUE intelligence of the loss of the clipper-ship Flora Temple reached us a few days since. A detailed account of the fearful catastrophe has now come to hand, and we learn that no fewer than 850 persons, principally coolie labourers, have perished with the ill-fated vessel. The Flora Temple was a first-class ship, and, having been chartered for the conveyance of coolies, sailed from Macao on the morning of the 8th of last October. Her crew, included officers, were about fifty men, and four days after leaving port they encountered a heavy gale of wind from the south-west, with a high sea. By the 14th, however, the gale had abated. The position of the ship was thought to be a safe one, but in the evening the cry of "Hard up!" was heard from the lookout. It was then discovered that the ship was within a short distance of the breakers, and in the course of a few minutes she struck first slightly, and then very soon afterwards several times with a tremendous crash, the breakers running very high alongside. Pieces of her timber and planking floated on her portside, and after some more very heavy bumps she remained apparently immovable.

While this was going on a fear that the coolies would rise and murder all on board seemed to have possessed the minds of the crew; and to such a height did this rise that the captain (having at the time, however, no intention of abandoning the ship) had the two quarter-boats lowered, and placed an officer and five men in each, with orders to remain close to the ship so that refuge and assistance might be at hand. The crew appeared to have been thoroughly unmanned: their only anxiety was to get out of the ship, and but for the captain and his brother, and a few others on board, the boats would have left the ship absolutely unprovided with the necessaries of life. These boats were lowered at ten o'clock, and by four a.m. the long-boat and the remainder of the crew had got away. At break of day the ship appeared to be almost without motion. Her masts were standing, she had a strong list to port, her back was broken, and the sea making a clear breach over her starboard quarter. The coolies, who had remained below all night, were now up and clustered on the upper decks. The captain, after passing round the northern extremity of the line of breakers, joined the starboard quarter boat, which had the smaller boats in company, the port-quarter boat with one second mate in charge having deserted during the night, alarmed, probably, at the guns which were fired from the ship, and which to them seemed to denote the dreaded outbreak of the coolies. The crews of the dingies were then transferred to the long-boat and quarter-boat, and at nine a.m. sail was made to the westward. The boats encountered severe weather, and the men suffered dreadfully. Eventually, however, on the Wednesday, twelve days after leaving the wreck, land was made to the south of Touron, and on the following evening they came in sight of the French squadron. They were received on board his Imperial Majesty's steamer Gironde, and Captain Johnson at once put himself into communication with the French Admiral, M. Page, and begged him to send in search of the missing boats as well as to rescue the coolies. With the greatest readiness the request was complied with, and the Gironde was dispatched to the scene of the disaster, Captain Johnson, his brother, and Mr. Childs, the surgeon, accompanying her. They came in sight of the reef on the afternoon of the 2nd of November. The sea still rolled and broke as before; but no remnant could be seen of the ship till, on proceeding closer in a boat, her port side from the main-chain forward could be observed floating. Of the 850 coolies no traces remained. Close to the reef, within a short distance of the wreck on the S.E. side, the boat sounded, and found no bottom at twenty-seven fathoms; and within a mile to the north-west there was no bottom at seventy fathoms. The breakers extended about half a mile in a curved line. They were very narrow, not over 150 yards in width. The position, according to the calculation on board the Gironde, was 10° 19′ N., 113° 13′ E., whilst Captain Johnson made it in 10° 16′ N. and 113° 20′ E. Nothing remained to be done. The unhappy coolies had, doubtless, perished; and the Gironde at once shaped a course for Manilla, where she arrived on the evening of the 8th of November.

It appears that the crew had grounds for the fear which possessed them that the coolies might rise against them, several attempts of the kind having been made, and one of the crew having been cruelly murdered while separated from his companions.

Last Saturday a despatch was received by the Board of Trade, from the Consul at Madeira, announcing the total wreck, at the north-western end of that island, of the British ship Flying Foam, with the loss of the commander, Captain William Liddle, and the whole of the crew except six. The ship belonged to Messrs. Corbo and Potten, of London, and sailed on the 2nd of last month from Cardiff, with a cargo of coals for Shanghai. She struck on a sunken rock about two hundred yards from the land or coast of Porto di Moniz, and speedily went to pieces.

The Niagara, of Greenock, from London to the former place, was lost on the shore of Cantyre on Thursday se'nnight. The point where the casualty occurred is very precipitous, and the gaff of the spritsail having slewed round towards the shore, one of the seamen slid down from the point upon the rocks; others followed, and, to facilitate the landing, a loop was made on a small rope, which was fastened round the waist of the captain's wife, and she was drawn to the shore, whilst her three children were brought by the seamen. In this manner they all landed in safety within a hundred yards of the spot where the casualty occurred to the New York packet last year. The captain remained by the vessel, but she is a total wreck.

Accounts have been received at Liverpool of the total loss of the American and Liverpool trader Silas Holmes. Five women and four men were picked up in a boat, being the remainder of the crew and passengers of the ship, which foundered on the 16th of December, when five days out from Gardner Island Key, where she had been aground. The other portion of the crew and passengers, thirty-two in number, are supposed to have perished.

The American papers report the wreck on Little Bahama Bank, of the American ship Margaret, of Portland, H. A. Merryman, master, from New Orleans, bound for Glasgow. She had a cargo of 1340 bales of cotton, which, with the exception of a few bales, was all saved, part having arrived at Nassau in several wrecking-vessels.

THE "BLERVIE CASTLE."—The mystery surrounding the loss of this vessel has at length been cleared up—the wreck having been discovered near the Ridge Sand by some Dover fishermen. A large number of packages which formed part of the ship's cargo, were, it may be remembered, picked up on the French coast some time ago; but it is believed that a very considerable portion still remains in the wreck. We have not heard that any bodies have, as yet, been washed ashore.

A MONSTER IRON-CASED FRIGATE.—The design of the steam-ram laid down at Blackwall has been altered (so we are informed by the Times), and is now to be built merely as a shot-proof, heavy-armed frigate of perhaps 36, or perhaps 70, guns, as the Admiralty may eventually decide. She is to be named the Warrior, and will be at once fire and shot proof—the largest, strongest, and swiftest man-of-war afloat in the world. The two iron-cased vessels, or steam-rams proper, which are now being built—one on the Tyne, by Palmer; and the other by Westwood and Bailey, at Millwall—are, though both shot-proof, smaller in tonnage and armament, and nearly 100 feet shorter, than this gigantic frigate, the Warrior. Though great progress has been made with the Warrior, the more striking parts of the hull, such as the beak and stern, have yet to be built up. The wrought-iron "box-girders" which run throughout the vessel from stem to stern are the most powerful things of their kind that have ever yet been made; yet all these beams and girders, angle-irons, and tie-rods, of which the whole hull is apparently built, are mere trifles to the things which have yet to be put into her. A whole mountain of teak, which half fills one part of the yard, has to be consumed in her outer "lining," while her armour-plates lie about in ponderous slabs, weighing many tons, each from 16 to 18 feet long, 4 feet wide, and 4½ inches thick. The nose or cutwater of the vessel is one immense slab of wrought iron, about 30 feet long, 10 inches thick, and weighing upwards of 17 tons. The screw-frame is one piece of the finest forged iron, without the slightest flaw of any kind, and weighing no less than 44 tons. Till the present work was commenced such masses of forgings were never thought of, even in the construction of the Great Eastern. The Warrior's dimensions are:—Extreme length, 380 feet; ditto breadth, 58 feet; depth, 41 feet 6 inches; and her tonnage no less than 6177 tons. The engines (screw, of course) are to be by Penn and Sons, of 1250-horse power. Their total weight, with boilers, will be 950 tons. For these she will only be able to carry 950 tons of coal, or enough for about six days' steaming. The armament (counting her only a 36-gun frigate), with masts and stores, will weigh 1200 tons, and this, with the hull, which is to be no less than 5700 tons, will give her a total weight, when ready for sea, of about 9000 tons in all, or the weight of the Great Eastern when launching. Speed of not much less than fifteen or sixteen knots an hour is anticipated, so that should her commander, in case of any emergency, choose to use her as a steam-ram, he could literally drive his ship straight over a whole fleet of three-deckers without a chance of being injured by their broadsides in closing. The Warrior will enjoy almost perfect immunity from the heaviest shot and shell from the tremendous strength with which she is constructed. The whole vessel is subdivided in some twenty places by wrought-iron water-tight bulkheads of the most solid description. Thus, supposing it possible that both stem and stern should be shot away completely, the fighting portion of the vessel would remain as complete and as impenetrable as ever, still supposing twenty inches of teak with five inches of wrought iron to every shot. The Warrior will be armed with Armstrong's longest-range guns, and throwing shot of 100lb. weight, which will enable her to commence her action with her enemy at least four miles distant. At two miles she herself will be to the enemy out of range for all practical purposes, even for the heaviest smooth-bore guns yet used in any navy, and at 1000 yards distance a 68-pounder shot scarcely dints her iron sides to the depth of half an inch. In fact, every possible contingency seems to have been provided against for her security, except the probability of her rolling in such a manner as to be incapable of using her guns in anything of a seaway.

THE TEMPLE FORTS OF DWARKA AND BEYT.

As these forts have been lately besieged and taken by a British force, some account of them, in connection with our Engraving on page 72, may be of interest to our readers.

Both Dwarka and Beyt are situated in the district of Okhamundel, at the western extremity of the province of Kattywar, and at the entrance of the Gulf of Cutch. Both contain temples of antiquity, and Dwarka in particular is a place of great sanctity among Hindoos, containing the most celebrated of all the shrines to Krishna. It is in consequence resorted to as a place of pilgrimage from all parts of India. The great temple is situated on an eminence near the seashore, and is strongly fortified. Below these fortifications a densely-populated town has sprung up, and the steeples of many minor temples nestle round the great Temple of Krishna.

The inhabitants of Okhamundel are chiefly Wagheers, a mixed race, who have intermarried with some of the Rajpoot families of Kattywar. They were originally boatmen, and their profession has always been piracy. Beyt, an island and their favourite abode, is a regular pirates' stronghold, barely to be seen from the open sea. It is surrounded by shoals, and is only to be approached by a winding, narrow, and intricate channel, yet when a vessel securely enters there is a good and sheltered harbour, with plenty of deep water.

In the early part of this century the inhabitants of Beyt and Dwarka were such daring pirates that even large merchant-vessels were plundered by them. In the year 1801 they captured a British vessel, massacred the crew, throwing overboard the captain and his lady. To obtain satisfaction for this outrage Colonel Walker, our Resident at Baroda, went into Kattywar with a considerable force to reduce the Wagheer chiefs of Beyt and Dwarka to submission, and eventually they entered into agreements with him to abstain from piracy. In violation of these engagements they continued still to plunder till, in 1820, matters became so bad that another British force under Colonel Lincoln Stanhope was sent into Okhamundel. Dwarka was taken by storm, the district speedily reduced, some of the Wagheer chiefs were killed, and others sent as state prisoners to Surat. The district was then made over to the Government of the Guicowar, to whom it had long been nominally tributary. Since this Okhamundel has not required a military force to assist the civil power: the daring spirit of its former masters has slumbered, though the piratical spirit of its population has never been entirely quenched.

Recently this slumbering spirit in the Wagheer has burst forth with its old love for plunder. They set at nought the Guicowar's Government, refused all payment of tribute, killed his officers, plundered villages, and, defying all authority, threw themselves into the fortified temples of Beyt and Dwarka. The Guicowar's own troops being quite powerless to coerce them, a British force, under Colonel Donovan, of her Majesty's 33rd Regiment, was sent against them. This force first attacked Beyt. They thought too lightly of the enemy, and, although the force was accompanied by two powerful steam-frigates, the Feroze and the Zenobia, each carrying eight 68-pounders, with which the walls of the town might have been destroyed, and a practicable breach made in the fort, yet, without this necessary precaution, her Majesty's 28th Regiment and the 6th Native Infantry were landed immediately under the walls, and exposed to a heavy fire. They found the streets barricaded with guns in position, the fort walls too high for the scaling-ladders, and no practicable breach, so that the force, after sustaining a severe loss in killed and wounded, had to retire.

That same night the Wagheers evacuated the fort, carrying off with them a large quantity of plunder, and joined their comrades in the still stronger fort of Dwarka. It was not till morning that Colonel Donovan found the fort of Beyt deserted. On entering treasure to the extent of between three to four lacs was secured. The engineers were directed to demolish the fortifications, which they have done most effectually, for nothing now remains of the fort and temples of Beyt but a heap of ruins.

Colonel Donovan next removed his force by transports to Dwarka, where it was joined by Colonel Scobie, a senior officer, with considerable reinforcements. Thus united, the troops could not have numbered less than 3000 men, one half of which were British soldiers, while the Wagheers might have numbered 2000 or 2500 men at most. The tactics before Dwarka were the reverse of the attack on Beyt: there rashness and want of due precaution had characterised the proceedings; here the extreme of caution was the order of the day. The artillery opened fire at a range of upwards of 2000 yards. A long and extended line of pickets to connect the two camps were thrown out over several miles of jungle country, whereas the troops should have closed in on to the island in the Goomtee River, the date grove, and the eminence near the pool of water—all commanding positions, from which the town and fort could have been bombarded with great effect.

Meantime the Hindoos of Bombay had heard with dismay that the Fort of Beyt, with its temples, had been blown into the air. They feared a similar fate awaited the holy shrines of Dwarka. They went with a monster petition to Lord Elphinstone, and he, in a spirit of clemency, issued strict injunctions to spare the temples; forgetting that these temples were the very citadels of the fort, that they were full of the most desperate rebels, and that even the population of the country sympathised with and assisted these Wagheers, while they failed either to supply our straitened force with provisions or give us the slightest intelligence. As might be expected, the Wagheers all congregated in the great temple, where they were quite safe.

The commanders of the force, thus hampered with instructions and warned by the recent losses at Beyt, pursued an over-cautious course. They had been a fortnight before Dwarka, and, though their firing had done much damage to the town, they had made no particular breach in the fort walls; and still the rebel flag waved on the highest pinnacle of the temple. A dense cactus jungle surrounds Dwarka on the land side—in itself a formidable defence. Every path was well known to the Wagheers, but to our troops it was a perfect labyrinth, and it was on the borders of this jungle that our long line of pickets was placed. The Wagheers made nightly sorties through this jungle, and greatly harassed our troops. But on the night of the 30th of October last the whole 2000 Wagheers, with their women and their treasure laden on carts and on camels, sallied forth in the darkness of the night, and, finding a weak point, cut their way through the pickets of her Majesty's 28th Regiment. It was a most masterly retreat, and could not have been better planned and executed. The whole batch of them got clear out of Okhamundel, across the Runn and into the Burda Hills, with the loss of seven or eight killed. They retreated quite in military order, throwing out pickets and skirmishers as they retired. There can be little doubt that several of the Bengal mutineers were among their ranks—in fact, the uniform of several sepoys was recognised.

Dwarka was immediately occupied by our troops. Every street was found barricaded, sandbag batteries with guns placed in strong positions—the work of no Wagheer, but displaying the engineering skill of a disciplined soldier. A flight of massive stone steps was passed, leading to the principal gate of the temple called the "Gate of Heaven," and a jolly tar was soon seen ascending the pinnacle of the temple and there hoisting the union-jack. Dwarka is now in our hands; but the Wagheers have escaped into the hills, and no doubt consider themselves as victorious. Singular to say, that in Dwarka, as well as in Beyt, quantities of Government and private stores were found—commissariat, ordnance, and medical stores of all kinds, wines, beer, millinery, shawls, silks, piece goods, &c., all unopened, showing clearly that the Wagheers still plunder. These were goods no doubt intended either for Kurrachee or Bombay.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

TURIN.

EVERY day adds to the difficulty of what—once called the "Italian Question"—has now become, by the joint action of delay and diplomacy, the congeries of "Italian Questions." It is a curious fact, and will, doubtless, some day or other, be a puzzle for future historians, that personal resentments have played a larger part in the embarrassment of this difficulty than any one not conversant with the nearer working of motives would be disposed to believe.

That in this spirit all Austrian diplomacy is conducted no one will for a moment dispute. The Emperor's object may be summed up in this brief sentence: "Nothing for Piedmont; cut, carve, disfranchise, and dethrone as you may; but let it be well understood Piedmont is not to reap the benefit." Never was there a policy more distinctly and avowedly personal. To the ambition of Victor Emmanuel, stimulated by the more aggressive spirit of Cavour, Austria traces every disaster of the last year; and, from the treaty of Villafranca to the present hour, all her acts have testified that the only humiliation she cannot descend to is to recognise Piedmont as her conqueror. She ceded Lombardy to France; and she is now—so, at least, some politicians of Vienna assert—not unwilling to make conditions for the cession of the Venetian states, to form, with the Duchies, a kingdom of Upper Italy, on the one condition, however, that Piedmont is not to have it. Few men, it may be presumed—if temperament mean anything—might be less readily supposed the slaves of personal motives than the French Emperor, and yet there is little doubt that what has been called Italian ingratitude has weighed heavily on his mind, and that he has never forgotten the insult which met him at Turin on returning from the field of Solferino, when his portrait in the printshop stood side by side with that of Orsini. It is not in human nature to suppose that such an outrage should not have its influence.

And, lastly, our own Foreign Secretary, if report speaks truly, is not free from the sway of certain personal resentments for the marked absence of all attentions to him during his winter in Tuscany, and when his only Italian society consisted of very undistinguished associates of very doubtful reputation. Whether this be strictly correct or not, he certainly availed himself of the advantage of the great Talleyrand maxim, and fortified his mind against prejudices by only hearing one side of the question.

If it be at first sight hard to conceive that great interests receive their impulse from such small and insignificant forces, the consideration of how much is explained by this solution will go far to induce the belief. Nor is it necessary, though it would not be difficult, to extend the catalogue through the other principal actors in this great drama.

In a very witty article the Examiner once wrote on some charge of the Bishop of Exeter it said that, "great as the Right Rev. Lord was in all the dialectics of abuse, terrible in vituperation, and withering in sarcasm, he was never so really formidable as when he prayed for his enemies!" So of Pio Nono, who has just given, in a reply to the French General commanding at Rome, a most marked instance of his skill in this branch of Christian charity; and even the English Bishop would confess himself vanquished in the piety of the peroration which implores Providence to enlighten the intelligence of the Emperor, that he may see in a late pamphlet "all the stains of its hypocrisy and the grossness of its contradictions," after which happy consummation he and the Empress, and the Prince Imperial, and, indeed, everybody else down to M. Fould, are to receive innumerable benedictions. Now, when you have every reason to believe that a man has either himself done a particular act or concurred in the performance of it by another it is, to say the least, a strong measure to wish him health and happiness on the express understanding that he can deny what you well know he cannot deny. Infallibility, of course, has its privileges; but for ordinary mortals, who wear felt hats and not triple crowns, this would be no common difficulty.

Italian prospects do not brighten as we go further south. It would seem as if "Quem Deus vult perdere—he first makes King of Naples!" Short of the plea of insanity—and a very bad form of the malady too—there is no explanation or excuse for the Ruler of this unhappy kingdom. For less than a fiftieth part of his transgressions Austria was mulcted of her fairest and richest province; and, as if with a perverse insolence meant to provoke repression, this boy tyrant adds every day and every hour to the enormities of his infamous rule. What will be said at some future day if it should be proved that all Europe, awakened to judge the crimes of Princes, and hearing the complaints of peoples, permitted a maniac to sport for years with the lives, the fortunes, and the fates of an entire nation? Will it be credited that the felonies and petty larcenies of Austria cost a Magenta and a Solferino, and that the dungeons and scaffolds of Naples attracted neither notice nor reproof?

It may be said his day is coming; but surely there is no impatience in begging that it may be soon. And now, what is to come of all these complications and entanglements? Such is the question one meets at every side; and every three out of four give the same answer—War! Here, indeed, the conviction is more general still; and such persons as from their station may be supposed to know the sentiments of the King, allege that his Majesty regards the event as certain. The Piedmontese say, let France but keep her present army in Lombardy, with the declaration that no Austrian shall enter there, and we ourselves, with the aid of the Central Italian troops, will wrest Venice from Austria. Our left flank protected by France, the field of operations would be so far diminished that we could respond to all its requirements, and make a simultaneous attack on the fortresses and on Venice.

That these are not idle speculations the great preparations now making by Piedmont prove. Two frigates of the largest size, their armament heavier than that of the celebrated Wabash, are now ready, and will be commissioned immediately; six gun-boats are in a state of near completion; and the foundries of Turin are in full work casting rifled cannon—all which preparations bear about the same relation to peace that the Pope's blessings bear to goodwill and charity.

THE NAPIER STATUE IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

ON Saturday week the colossal marble statue of the late General Sir Charles Napier was uncovered in St. Paul's Cathedral. A large concourse of ladies and gentlemen was present on the occasion, including Colonel Kennedy, the aide-de-camp of the late General, and a number of his old Indian friends and colleagues. The statue is placed close to the north entrance of the cathedral. The General is represented in a standing position, with a burst cannon for the support of the statue. The dress is the ordinary undress of an officer, but the

That torment of our brightest days,
And horror of our nights.
Their action on the human system is gradually and mildly to expel from it all undigested accumulations and impurities; and then, when taken freely, so to saturate it with the antiseptic and tonic properties peculiar to the hop plant as to astonish the patient by his immunity from his old enemy.
These pills are supplied to the public (through agents only) by the proprietor, Mr. F. A. RICHARDSON, Long Ditton Surrey, in boxes at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each; and may be had of all dealers in patent medicines.

figure has a military cloak depending from the shoulders. On the hero's breast is the handsome star which the deceased received for his exploits in India. His left hand rests upon his sword, and his right hand, holding a scroll of paper, rests upon the hip. The figure, which is eight feet six inches in height, is beautifully executed in the purest Carrara marble. The pedestal is of Sicilian marble, and the inscription is as follows:—"CHARLES JAMES NAPIER; a prescient General; a beneficent Governor; a just man." The sculptor, Mr. George G. Adams, deserves high praise for the artistic manner in which he has completed his work, and for the lifelike expression with which he has endowed the boldly-chiseled features of this fine statue. The statue has been raised by the committee with the surplus fund remaining from the public subscription from all classes—even private soldiers—raised for the bronze statue by the same artist, at Trafalgar square, of the late General. The chairman of the committee, through whose instrumentality the monument has been erected, is the Earl of Ellenborough, the secretaries being Lord Clyde and Colonel Kennedy.

BANBURY CROSS.

BANBURY was for centuries without a cross, the old one having been demolished at the period of the Reformation; and it was not until the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal of England with Frederick William of Prussia that it was resolved by the inhabitants, in commemoration of the event, to restore a structure the fame of which had extended into every nursery. How many little folk out of temper have been quieted by a smart canter on the nurse's knee to the tune of "Ride a cock-horse to Banbury Cross" it would be impossible to tell. That Banbury should be without its cross was as unreasonable as that Coventry should be without its "Peeping Tom," or Canterbury shorn of the shrine of Thomas à Becket. To think of Banbury without a "cross" is, indeed, to run counter to all the reminiscences of childhood, and to set at defiance all the records of legendary lore. The good people of Banbury did well, therefore, to restore the chief ornament of their town. The structure is now completed, and Banbury is itself again.

The new cross is an elegant structure of the hexagonal form, erected from a design by Mr. Gibbs, of Oxford, who has identified himself with the development of this class of architecture with much success. It is fifty-two feet in height, of Bath stone, and is divided into three stories or compartments. The panels of the centre compartment are richly ornamented with the foliage of the rose, ivy, acacia, chestnut, hollyhook, and vine, and graced with the arms of Queen Mary and Victoria, Kings Charles I. and George I., Princess Frederick William of Prussia, the Earls of Banbury and Guilford, Viscount Saye and Sele, Sir W. Compton, the Bishop of Lincoln, and the Rev. W. Whateley, who was Vicar of Banbury from 1610 to 1639. Statues will be placed in the niches of the lower stage, beneath which are fountains. The cross is beautifully ornamented with carved capitals and rich foliage, and has a very dignified appearance in theold town.

For most of the foregoing details we are indebted to a compandious and pleasantly-written "Guide to Banbury," published by Mr. Walford, High-street, in which the author, Mr. W. F. Johnson, gives a succinct sketch of the history of the town, a summary of its public buildings, and a glance at its trade.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1014.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT, 1860.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"It is with great satisfaction that I again meet you in Parliament, and have recourse to your assistance and advice.

"My relations with foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and satisfactory footing.

"At the close of the last Session I informed you that overtures had been made to me to ascertain whether, if a Conference should be held by the great Powers of Europe, for the purpose of settling arrangements connected with the present state and future condition of Italy, a Plenipotentiary would be sent by me to assist at such a Conference. I have since received a formal invitation from the Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a Plenipotentiary to a Congress to consist of the representatives of the eight Powers who were parties to the Treaties of Vienna of 1815; the objects of such Congress being stated to be, to receive communication of the treaties concluded at Zurich; and to deliberate, associating with the above-mentioned Powers the Courts of Rome, of Sardinia, and of the Two Sicilies, on the means best adapted for the pacification of Italy, and for placing its prosperity on a solid and durable basis.

"Desirous at all times to concur in proceedings having for their object the maintenance of peace, I accepted the invitation, but, at the same time, I made known that, in such a Congress, I should steadfastly maintain the principle that no external force should be employed to impose upon the people of Italy any particular Government or Constitution

"Circumstances have arisen which have led to a postponement of the Congress, without any day having been fixed for its meeting; but whether in Congress or in separate negotiation I shall endeavour to obtain for the people of Italy freedom from foreign interference by force of arms in their internal concerns, and I trust that the affairs of the Italian peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

"Papers on this subject will soon be laid before you.

"I am in communication with the Emperor of the French with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and thus to draw still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them.

"A dispute having arisen between Spain and Morocco, I endeavoured, by friendly means, to prevent a rupture; but, I regret to say, without success.

"I will direct papers on this subject to be laid before you.

"My Plenipotentiary and the Plenipotentiary of the Emperor of the French having, in obedience to their instructions, proceeded to the mouth of the Peiho River, in order to repair to Pekin to exchange in that city the ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the 56th article of that treaty, their further progress was opposed by force, and a conflict took place between the Chinese forts at the mouth of the river and the naval forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted.

"The allied forces displayed on this occasion their usual bravery, but, after sustaining a severe loss, were compelled to retire.

"I am preparing, in concert and co-operation with the Emperor of the French, an expedition intended to obtain redress and a fulfilment of the stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

"It will be gratifying to me if the prompt acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate demands which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries shall obviate the necessity for the employment of force.

"I have directed that papers on this subject shall be laid before you.

"An unauthorised proceeding by an officer of the United States in regard to the island of San Juan, between Vancouver's Island and the mainland, might have led to a serious collision between my forces and those of the United States. Such collision, however, has been prevented by the judicious forbearance of my naval and civil officers on the spot, and by the equitable and conciliatory provisional arrangement proposed on this matter by the Government of the United States.

"I trust that the question of boundary, out of which this affair has arisen, may be amicably settled in a manner conformable with the just rights of the two countries, as defined by the first article of the Treaty of 1846.

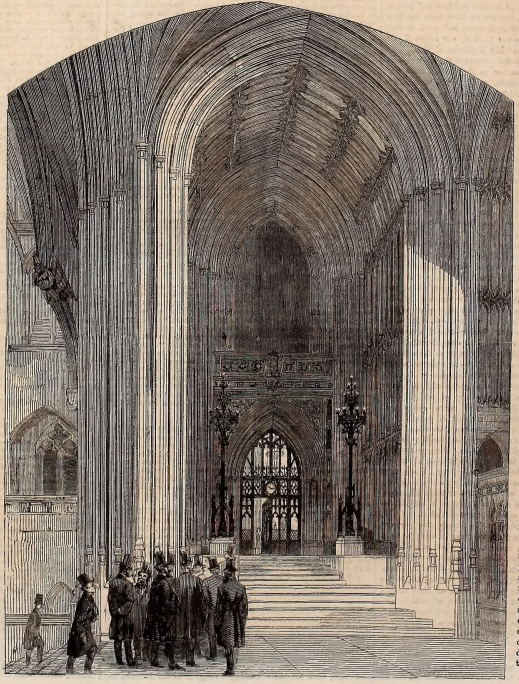
"The last embers of disturbance in my East Indian dominions have been extinguished. My Viceroy has made a peaceful progress through the districts which had been the principal scene of disorder, and, by a judicious combination of firmness and generosity, my authority has been everywhere solidly and, I trust, permanently established. I have received from my Viceroy the most gratifying accounts of the loyalty of my Indian subjects, and of the good feeling evinced by the native chiefs and the great landowners of the country. The attention of the Government in India has been directed to the development of the internal resources of the country; and I am glad to inform you that an improvement has taken place in its financial prospects.

"I have concluded a treaty with the Tycoon of Japan, and a treaty regarding boundaries with the Republic of Guatemala. I have directed that these treaties shall be laid before you.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"I have directed the Estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you. They have been prepared with a view to place the military and naval services, and the defences of the country, upon an efficient footing.

"I am glad to be able to inform you that the public revenue is in a satisfactory condition.



"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"I have accepted, with gratification and pride, the extensive offers of voluntary service which I have received from my subjects. This manifestation of public spirit has added an important element to our system of national defence.

"Measures will be laid before you for amending the laws which regulate the representation of the people in Parliament, and for placing that representation upon a broader and firmer basis.

"I earnestly recommend you to resume your labours for the improvement of our jurisprudence, and particularly in regard to bankruptcy, the transfer of land, the consolidation of the statutes, and such a further fusion of law and equity as may be necessary to ensure that, in every suit, the rights of the parties may be satisfactorily determined by the Court in which the suit is commenced.

"I am deeply gratified to observe that the great interests of the country are generally in a sound and thriving condition; that pauperism and crime have diminished; and that, throughout the whole of my empire, both in the mother country and in my colonies and possessions beyond sea, there reigns a spirit of loyalty, of contentment, of order, and of obedience to the law.

"With heartfelt gratitude to the Almighty Ruler of nations for these inestimable blessings, I fervently pray that his beneficent power may guide your deliberations for the advancement and consolidation of the welfare and happiness of my people."

INNOVATION is not always improvement ent; but the Session of Parliament of 1860 will be noted for the combination of an innovation and an improvement. For once her Majesty, addressing the Legislature from the throne, has not been compelled to speak and yet say nothing. This State paper, usually so inane, on this occasion contains fu'ness of information while it avoids prolixity. It is direct in its statements, and indicative of purpose. In its reference to foreign policy it touches without reticence, and free from equivocation, the course which the Government has pursued and intends to follow in the conduct of their share in those affairs with which the European Powers are about to deal. The principles which are enunciated as the ruling motive of England as one of the arbitrators in the Italian question are such as cannot but meet with the approval of the country, simply because they are wholly coincident with their own reiterated opinions. We have an unambiguous declaration that, either in Congress or in separate negotiation, the object of our Ministry will be to oppose any attempt by external force to impose on the people of Italy, with regard to Government or Constitution, which every endeavour will be made to obtain for them freedom from foreign interference by force of arm in their national concerns. By a natural and obvious sequence a hope is then expressed that the affairs of the Italian peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled. So decided and emphatic an announcement could only have been justified by a consciousness of the proud and commanding attitude in which England stands in this respect; and it is calculated at once to spread hope and confidence over Italy, already half-emancipated by such a proclamation, and to shake to its very elements and foundation any opposition to her proximate liberation from the thrall of despotism which may have been in preparation in the councils of those whose dark influences have so long brooded over her destinies.

If there was a difficulty which the Government was likely to encounter, it was involved in what is called the Chinese question. Happily, here again her Majesty's Speech gives assurance where little or none was to be expected. That which was, with regard to which there have been rumours of divided opinions and predictions of Ministerial discordances, appears to have been handled with the skill of statesmen and the good sense and good feeling of Englishmen; and it will not be the fault of the rulers if the necessity of having recourse to the "last argument of Kings" be not averted. It is to be remarked that no part of the observations of the mover of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, in the House of Commons, was received with more signal approval than that in which he remarks on the hopes and probabilities of a peaceful solution of our difficulties with China. We believe that the feeling indicated in Parliament is representative of the sentiments of the general public, and that as much from a distaste for a species of war which does not, with none of the glitter of military glory, as from a sense of the prudence and wisdom of a course of conciliation and generosity towards a nation which is more apprehensive of European mode of thought and impulse of action than is generally supposed, with remaining parts of the Queen's dominions which treat of matters outside of our domestic boundaries, the expectation of the probable extinguishment of the small spark of dissension between this country and the United States, and the emphatic declaration of the unabridged maintenance of the integrity of our rule in India, are as plainly as they are satisfactorily stated.

When we turn to the paragraphs of the Royal Message which declare the feelings and the intentions of her counsellors with regard to home affairs, we cannot but admit the fitness and propriety of the peaceful recognition of that public spirit which has eventuated in the offers of voluntary service for national defence, a demonstration which it is acknowledged has strengthened the hands of Ministers and established the dignity and position of England in Europe and in the world. The promise of a measure of Parliamentary Reform is so distinct and unequivocal that it hardly required so direct an attestation of sincerity as the notice of the period at which a bill on the subject will be introduced, which was on the very first day of the meeting of Parliament. Equally unmistakable is the announcement of coming amendment in our system of jurisprudence, while the tendency of the proposed alterations towards the simplification and more ready administration of several branches of our law is patent. It would not be easy to point out what more could be stated in so formal a document as a Queen's speech must of necessity be. It is emphatically a programme and an invitation. Perhaps the best test of its merits is to be found in the debates in both Houses of Parliament which immediately followed its delivery. Each theme was, strictly speaking, none; criticism hardly; while comment was of the sparsest and often of the most friendly character. Leaders of the Opposition were fain to imply their inability to oppose, and Ministers were not called upon to defend.

If it is a bad augury to stumble at the beginning of a journey, perhaps the converse omen of a good start may be accepted as a favourable one. One thing is certain, and that is, that the Government have a fair field before them. They are in every sense masters of the situation. Nothing but dissension among themselves can weaken their position; and, if the preparation of the Royal Speech is to be taken as an indication of their united action, it foreshadows a course of conduct which will tend to perpetuate that state of prosperity and tranquillity, and that spirit of loyalty, of contentment, of order, and of obedience to the law, on the existence of which her Majesty has so earnestly congratulated her Parliament and her people.

The new Mechanics' Hall at Middlesbrough was inaugurated on Thursday week, when Mr. Roebu k, M.P., spoke at co siderable en.

PRINCIPAL ENTRANCE TO ST. STEPHEN'S HALL, NEW PALACE OF WESTMINSTER.

THIS entrance is arrived at from two points—from the fine old hall known as Westminster Hall, and from the members' staircase, reached by a doorway situated in the angle in Old Palace yard. From Westminster Hall there is an ascent of some three or four and twenty steps, with landings. Turning to the left, we have the entrance shown in our illustration: here we find a flight of twelve steps before reaching the Hall of St. Stephen. On each side of this flight have just been placed a beautiful sandstone bench, of two compartments, with a centre for gas, each standard having upwards of thirty gas jets. These standards are of the same design as those in the old hall, and are bronzed and gilded. The vaulted and groined ceiling has a fine effect. The blank space above the doorway is to have a fresco within it, which will add greatly to the richness of the whole. The entrance of which we are now speaking is one through which the public pass to the various committee-rooms during the sitting of Parliament.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The treaty of commerce between France and England was signed on the 23rd inst. by the plenipotentiaries of both countries. On Wednesday, are the principal points of the treaty:—The import duty on French wines will be reduced in England from 150 to 30 per cent. Silk will be admitted free. The duty on iron imported into France will be 7f. per 100 kilogrammes. Wool and cotton manufactures will be protected by a duty not exceeding 30 per cent, which will be fixed after the termination of the inquiry. Materials of primary importance will enter France free of duty on the 1st July, 1861. The prohibitions will be removed on the 1st of October. The treaty will be executed by England from the date of its promulgation, about the beginning of February, 1860. The Pays says that the treaty will not be published before the 3rd of February; and that relative to the substitution of protective for prohibitive duties its treaty will only be put in force in July, 1861.

Several Chambers of Commerce have voted addresses to the Emperor expressing gratitude for his commercial reforms; but the French Protectionists are commencing an opposition as vigorous as Imperial legislation and administration permit against the commercial reforms which the Emperor intends to effect. A protest, signed by Messrs. Pouyer-Quertier and Mimerel, appeared in journals not been published in a Paris journal. This protest describes the proposed changes as "a fatal and overwhelming blow," and emphasises bitterly that they are to be effected without consultation with those whose interests are injured by them. The commercial treaty with England is declared to be especially obnoxious, because it binds us when it is concluded it must be observed, unless it be annulled by a law.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The intelligence from Morocco, via Madrid, is but meagre. The Spanish army is reported within four miles of Tetuan, which its projected "treaty march," so that we may expect to receive shortly accounts of greater import than it has yet conveyed. We learn from Madrid on the 24th inst. that all those Spanish vessels left at Algeciras have been ordered to hold the telegraph at that destination, and that the dissemblarition of material continues. A telegram to the same effect was also informed on the 23rd. Considerable masses of Moors attacked, on the 23rd, the advanced redoubt under construction on the Martin River. Some battalions of the Rica Division sent to the help of the Duke of Tetuan, who engaged the enemy. The infantry formed squares, and withstood the impetuous attacks of the Moorish cavalry. Our artillery then charged, and captured a flag. The loss of the Moors was very considerable, owing to the swampy nature of the ground and the precision of our artillery. Our loss was trifling.

A shocking railroad accident occurred at Lawrence, Massachusetts, on the 10th inst. About five o'clock in the afternoon the express train from Mills fell with an awful crash. The accounts of the catastrophe are not very precise, but the leading facts are that the factory fell in with a sudden crash when all the hands were busily employed before at work, and before they could be extricated many of them perished in the flames. According to the latest particulars fifty-five persons were taken out dead, sixty-five were missing and may be presumed to have perished, and one hundred and sixty-five were injured—many fatally.

The following details are from the American papers:—Some two or more acres of ground are covered up with every description of machinery and the fallen building. Huge bonfires are burning to light some two or three hundred persons who are working as if for their own lives to rescue the unfortunate persons, many of whom are still crying and begging to be released from their tortures. Every few minutes some portion of the ruins falls and the flames burst out and is heartrending to hear their cries as they are drawn out with legs and arms crushed, and the man, shocking and sickening to see, and partly under the bricks, deliberately cut his own throat to end his agony. The whole city seems in mourning. Many are running through the streets, frantic with excitement, shrieking their cries. Temporary hospitals have been arranged for those rescued. Many stand by the ruins in despair. Many bodies, literally burned to cinders by the clearing away, threatens death to those who may still be alive in the ruins. Some of these ropes below are constantly dragging out huge pieces of the wreck which destroys so many. Some of the rescuers are killed in their humane efforts. About half-past nine the fire broke out in the upper part of the mill, notwithstanding the efforts of the firemen, it gained such a footing that before midnight the whole establishment with the exception of the boiler, An inquest has been opened, and from the evidence of several witnesses there appeared to be no doubt but that the accident was owing to the thinness of the walls of the mills and at the unusually large number of windows. Workmen worked night and day at the ruins since the accident, bringing the bodies daily, some so frightfully mutilated as not to be recognised. Nothing of the mill remains standing but two tall chimneys. The majority of the killed and wounded are females. The origin of the fire is supposed to be due to the breaking of a lantern, which set fire to the cotton. Subscriptions in aid of the sufferers are being raised throughout the United Sates and Canada.

SALE BY AUCTION OF A TIGER AND A BEAR.—The Bombay Telegraph and Courier of December 27 says a rather extraordinary auction sale took place at Fort Gloucester on the 15th inst., when a fine male tiger, of the famous Shah Jehan breed, was knocked down to the highest bidder, much to the regret of the officers of the corps. The tiger was caught by great crowds of people during the day, and seemed to enjoy the pressure. Natives as well as the Viceroy came to see the tiger, Bombay sent down, and elsewhere. He appeared very gentle, exhibiting playfulness rather than ferocity. He was kept in a large enclosure, and was fed on goats, of which goods alone his gluttonous stomach. Upon making inquiries as to his history and antecedents, it was found that his mother was shot in the jungles by a sahib without the aid of cockney, and that his baby-mother had met a similar fate for pitching into a native herdsman. The first bid was a moderate one, and purchased the royal quadruped for 375 rupees, a sum which we fancy will be exceeded by five pounds should he live to be a year older. Bhurtpore. A white-trunked black bear was also disposed of on the same occasion, and to the same gallant sahib who purchased the tiger. Only bears of the Himalayas, which extend him to turn up his nose in a terce manner at the surrounding plains. The auctioneer was also in the act of disposing of a young interest. His mother was shot, in consequence of having an inordinate appetite for sugar, and possessing keenly developed olfactory nerves, and when the tiger magnanimously accepted the bear. On making inquiries we were told that a bullock cart upon the whole, with the exception of the tiger, was having had a taste of honey, never longed for it, as his sweet-tooth mamma-bear had, and he was last in a fair way to be spoiled by the indulgence by such a name. The only exception he ever committed was nearly frightening a native two youthful years ago, when a cart with honey had been sent on a friendly visit by his beneficent patron and protector. The two came to the end of the day's dinner, it appears, when the bear, for the time he sat looking from the one to the other, watching the remains of each one's plate, with a wistful gaze, and the word unfortunately have been well had they imbibed with the cheese, but the dessert, in the shape of cold meat, was set aside for Bevis. In the latter, which was in the centre of the table; decanters and glasses were smashed into fragments; pomegranates, melons, and almonds vanished as if by magic, and the bear revelled in the ruin he had wrought. With his innocent hilarity his attention to the two afterwards became the more alarming, until, losing all restraint, he threatened to hug them in a manner which promised to be more close than endearing. They therefore sought safety in a precipitate flight, and on returning some time afterwards with a posse of policemen, they found the bear taking a quiet siesta on one of his subterranean cots, with his claws enveloped in pieces of the curtain, the whole of which he had evidently used as a table napkin after the repast in the dining-room. This had been, we are informed, the head and front of his offending. We were, therefore, not at all surprised that he turned his nose up at the price for which he was sold. Had his owner not been a philanthropist he would have killed, cured, and converted him into bacon, bear's grease, and pemmican.

CHARGE OF MURDER ON THE HIGH SEAS.—On Tuesday George Dewer, the second mate of the Devonshire American steam-packet, was brought up at the Thames Police-court, charged with the wilful murder on the charge of having murdered James Humphreys on the high seas. Mr. Edlin, instructed by Messrs. Williamson and Williamson, of Liverpool, said that it was a case which, had it occurred in England, he would have considered it his duty to send for trial. He was, however, anxious that the defendant to be detained till a person was appointed by the American Government to take charge of the prisoner and proceed with him to Liverpool. He would have his trial before a jury, the best possible tribunal to decide in such a case. The circumstances attending the death of the deceased were strictly. Humphreys appears to have been subjected to the most inhuman treatment during the voyage from Liverpool to New York, and on the 14th he was at length drowned, as it is alleged, by being "jerked" off a rope by the prisoner. The latter, on the arrival of the vessel at Liverpool, on the prisoner declared that he had "calculated to drown him anyhow before long."

Mr. Eaton's runts and dragons were also very good, and other short-faced fancies, all very nice birds. Messrs. Griffith, Towse, Sapphard, and Hammond's pouters were very good. Mr. Hammond's barbs, Mr. Archer's pouters, &c. The show was very well attended.

HOW SAILORS SPEND THEIR MONEY.—Mr. Elizabeth Critchley, of Kewgreen, Kirby Moorside, Yorkshire, appeared before the Lord Mayor in Court on Monday, to answer a summons which charged her with detaining £10, 14s. from the wages of Cuthbert Gray Sanderson, a boy. Complainant said he had come home in the ship Inkerman, from Calcutta, after a seven months' voyage. He had received his wages, and on the 14th of December had a balance of £37 to receive. He was induced by the prisoner's husband, who lives between Kirby Moorside and Helmsley, to go to their house, at Church-road, Commercial-road East. He had been living there six weeks. He had received £10, 14s. from prisoner, and had left a balance of £26, 6s. The debt due to Mrs. Critchley was only £4 4s., and there was a balance due to her of £1, 10s. 6d. after the £4 4s. had been paid. He was not summoned. The answer to the case was that the complainant had received from his £37, about £10, and had spent it all in a week. He said he should like to know how the complainant had spent the rest of his wages in a week. He had been at sea 3 years, and had £37 to receive. He had spent the time he sat looking from the one to the other, watching the remains of each one's plate, with a wistful gaze, and the word unfortunately have been well had they imbibed with the cheese, but the dessert, in the shape of cold meat, was set aside for Bevis. In the latter, which was in the centre of the table; decanters and glasses were smashed into fragments; pomegranates, melons, and almonds vanished as if by magic, and the bear revelled in the ruin he had wrought. With his innocent hilarity his attention to the two afterwards became the more alarming, until, losing all restraint, he threatened to hug them in a manner which promised to be more close than endearing. They therefore sought safety in a precipitate flight, and on returning some time afterwards with a posse of policemen, they found the bear taking a quiet siesta on one of his subterranean cots, with his claws enveloped in pieces of the curtain, the whole of which he had evidently used as a table napkin after the repast in the dining-room. This had been, we are informed, the head and front of his offending. We were, therefore, not at all surprised that he turned his nose up at the price for which he was sold. Lord John Russell said that, as a representative of the city of London in the House of Commons, he would gladly take charge of the petition, and he quite agreed with the petitioners that the time had arrived when a measure of Parliamentary Reform should be submitted for consideration of Parliament. THE KING'S COLLEGE SOIRÉE.—The soirée given by the academical staff of King's College on the 19th inst. was very brilliantly attended. The rooms of the various professors were open to invitations of the Principal, and the large halls of the college, as well as the museum and theatre, were filled by crowds of visitors. Thanks to the unwearied exertions of Mr. J. W. Cunningham, the secretary, who was assisted by a number of the College staff, a most interesting exhibition of objects of art and novelties in science was brought together for the entertainment of the company. In one room the lime light used in the Drummond rays and illuminated the objects upon the walls with nearly the light of day. In the theatre there were batteries of microscopes in full play, illustrations by Dr. Wheatstone and armies of skyscrapers, under the generalship of Lieutenant Lovell and Mr. Lassell, were mounted in full-dress array on the parade ground. In one corner of the building Mr. Ladd established his telegraph with the electric needle, and the electric light, and Mr. Lloyd attracted a numerous crowd of admirers to his beautiful specimens of glass. In the same lecture room Professor Owen, by Dr. Mantell, Dr. Todd, Dr. Thomas Laycock, and Miss Mutrie—gladly assisted by Mr. Lucas, of the Royal Academy, and Mr. Gilbert, Queen of Scots, lent by Dr. Quilliard; good examples of Sidney Cooper, T. W. Cooke, and Hardy; and the "Death of Lucretia Borgia," exquisite little copies of Millais' "Proscribed Royalist" and Wallis's "Chatterton," lent by Mr. Lewis Pocock; a fine collection of pictures, including Mr. Dobson's "Charity of Dorcas," from Mr. Ruskin's collection; Mr. Sidney Cooper's "Cattle in the Stream," and others, including a "Portrait of Pitt" by Gainsborough, from Mr. Cox; and Mr. Frith's "Life at the Sea-side," lent by Mr. Henry Cole. Mr. Fergusson sent two very good chalk drawings after Landseer; the Rev. J. Bulwer sent very clever specimens of lithography; and four or five sketches of Priory; Mr. Henry Shaw a beautiful copy of the "Book of Hours" of Anne of Brittany; Messrs. Day and Son, with Mr. Bossoli's drawings, a series of their capital chromo-lithographs, which much attention. Even the sculptor was represented unrepresented. Mr. Russell Gurney lent for the occasion two Flaxman busts, and Mr. Wyon his clever "Britannia" and "Una and the Lion." Mr. Butler a very fine collection of busts; Mr. Foley a few bas-reliefs; and Mr. Durham his statue of Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Noble, unprofessional statues which lent additional grace to the rooms. The art-manufactures, as usual in all meetings of the kind, were very numerous and beautiful. The Queen lent a vase by Vechtl; Messrs. Lambert and Rawlings several exceedingly beautiful specimens of goldsmith's work; and Mr. Wyatt a collection of ancient armour and other metal-work, as well as a large copper bust of Charles I., which he had cast from Bernini's marble bust in the Royal Arsenal. The beautiful works, rivalling those by Benvenuto Cellini, which have of late years been manufactured by Messrs. Elkington, were also there, the production, and received the admiration due to their great merit. Mr. Hancock, besides contributing some of his own works, lent a fine vase by Charles I. on the scutell; a very fine star of the Order of the Garter, set with diamonds; and a beautiful little girdle of the Italian Renaissance; and an enamelled bracelet, ornamented after designs by Holbein. The Apostle spoons and tea-caddy-spoons lent by Mr. Lewis, and by Mr. Higgins, were a source of much interest to the lady visitors; and gentlemen found much to admire in the collection of Gothic congregational and ecclesiastical and domestic metal-work which Messrs. Hart now present to us in such pure Gothic forms. Messrs. Hardman lent their fine bronzes; Alderman Copeland a collection of his beautiful statuettes. Apsley Pellatt's Rock Crystal Fountain was another delight of every eye, and Mr. Powell's collection of ornamented glass tazzas and vases always had a crowd around them. Mr. Marshall Wood's statue of Shakspeare, and of five races, in the Styles style, manufactured in England for the Duke of Devonshire, and Mr. Bell's sculptures, and early specimens of Mr. Mc-W. J. Rogers lent the pulpit intended for St. Michael's, Cornhill. Mr. Warren's Indian Collection of Arms, and Mr. Hancock's Collection of Ancient Crosiers, Messrs. Colnet their copies of the Raphael cartoons; and Mr. Roach his Photographic Gun, were objects above all others of interest. The admission of these who saw it but but little to do with arts—it was an ingot of solid gold broken off from the mass in the Australian diggings, and some mighty concussion through an iron plate three-quarters of an inch in thickness; it was brought to the meeting from the wreck of the Royal Charter, and Mr. Chase, who so obligingly showed it, informed his hearers that, out of nearly three hundred pounds' weight of gold, all had been recovered from this ill-fated ship except some two or three thousand. The Queen's Band was present, as well as a choir of singers, who gave in the lecture-hall, under the leadership of Mr. Monk; or the band of the Coldstream Guards played in the large hall, under that of Mr. Godfrey. The room was decorated with exotic plants from the nursery of Mr. Veitch, of Chelsea, and the refreshments were liberally and well served by Mr. Gunter, who had him to contribute for the evening four waggon-loads of his choicest productions. The entertainment was given by the Council to the undergraduates of the college, including those belonging to the evening classes, and, we understand, was numerously attended.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will and codicil of Sir Richard Bedden Crowdy, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas, and Member for Hindon, have been proved in the principal Registry of the Court of Probate on the 21st inst., by the oaths of Richard Crowdy, Esq., of No. 42, Eaton-place, the sole executor. The personalty was sworn under £70,000. He has left to his brother Robert Crowdy, Esq., of Lower Grosvenor Gardens, a legacy of £17,000 for their own absolute use; to his housekeeper, Mrs. Hall, £1,000 and all household goods, &c.; to Mr. Hall, £2,000; also, the sole executor. The personalty was sworn under £70,000. He has left to his brother Robert Crowdy, Esq., of Lower Grosvenor Gardens, a legacy of £17,000 for their own absolute use; to his housekeeper, Mrs. Hall, £1,000 and all household goods, &c.; to Mr. Hall, £2,000; also, who appears to have been most highly esteemed by this excellent Judge; and to his wife, during her life time the terms of 14 years in his Judge's own words—"after I give to my faithful clerk, John Dickenson, whose long and attention and valuable services I have experienced for the last thirty years, and whose zeal, diligence, and integrity I have ever highly appreciated, the sum of £1,000." He will also confirm annuities in his own handwriting; and it is a remarkable fact that he suffered annuities to lapse in his will without any notice to the annuitants, the witnesses, or any allusion thereto in the attestation clause. The witnesses, however, to the will and codicil were not present to the execution.

The will of Lady Peel, relict of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart, P.C., of Whitehall-gardens, was administered to by her son, the Right Hon. Fred. Peel, M.P., the sole executor, under £70,000 personalty sworn to on the 21st inst. The will, which is very concisely and ably drawn, disposes of the jewellery, plate, pictures, and household furniture, which she has left to her son, as well as that previously her own, or since purchased by her, all of which she leaves to her son absolutely. To her daughters Victoria Emma Villiers and Mrs. Stonor £1000 each, and to her sons John and Arthur £500 each. The residue of her personalty she bequeaths to her son Frederick Peel, Esq., with the family plate, and an annuity of £5000, which was a charge upon the patrimonial estate of Drayton Manor.

The will and two codicils of Robert Willen Fforanz, Esq., late of Haverhill, Suffolk, and of Bishopsgate-street Without, Middlesex, have been proved at the principal Registry of the Court of Probate on the 16th of January by the oaths of Robert Fforanz, of Haverhill, Suffolk, Esq., and Robert Fforanz, of Morecombe, Lancashire, and Sarah Aisten and William Aisten, brother and nephew of the deceased, the executors. The personalty was sworn under an annuity of £1000 to Mrs. Aisten, and to whom he leaves the household furniture, plate, &c., and to her son William Aisten he leaves his brother Robert John Wilson Burton Fforanz (a minor), and to his issue; in default to Sarah Aisten for her life. To his brother Robert John Fforanz he leaves his estate on failure, then to the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital. The will was made in 1855, and the codicils in 1858 and 1859.

Accounts from Mexico state that Miramon has assembled a force of 3500 men for an attack on Vera Cruz, and confidently expects complete success. Juarez, and consequent termination of all authority yet possessed by Juarez, the "Liberal" President.

ARSENIC IN PAPERHANGINGS.—The deadly nature of certain kinds of green paperhangings is strikingly illustrated by the following case. Three children in the family of a gentleman residing near Epping were recently seized with the usual symptoms of poisoning, and for some time the medical men in attendance were completely baffled in their efforts either to check the symptoms or to discover their source. At length one of them noticed that the walls of the room in which the children slept were lined with a green paper; a portion of which he proceeded to analyse. The mystery was at once cleared up; the paper was found to be strongly impregnated with arsenic. The children were removed to another room, and are now recovering.

LITERATURE.

The Life of Field Marshal Arthur Duke of Wellington. By Charles Duke Yonge. Chapman and Hall.

The writer of these volumes is stated to be the author of a "History of England," and other works, which would lead to the belief that his main object in producing this life of the great Duke was to add something to scholastic literature Not that there is any decided internal evidence of the book having been designed solely for the use of the young; but, on the face of it, a work which disposes of the whole of Wellington's military career up to the battle of Waterloo in one volume, not too closely printed, and gets over his subsequent career to the time of his death and funeral in another, can hardly be supposed as intended to exhaust the subject. At least, Mr. Yonge's production does not go far towards putting an end to that statement, which even Brialmont's work has not satisfactorily met—namely, that the life of the Duke has yet to be written. The author himself speaks of the difficulty, almost the impossibility, of doing justice to the career of, perhaps, the greatest of his countrymen; but urges that its brilliancy and importance are such as to make even an imperfect relation of it not devoid of interest, while the difficulty is calculated to render success the more honourable; and even failure, if the attempt be only made with honesty and candour, not altogether discreditable. He will probably, therefore, be content if his critical readers avail themselves of his own phrase, and state their opinion that his work is not discreditable. But they may go further than that, and say that it is, on the whole, creditable to him. It will, we think, be allowed that, in a comparatively confined space, Mr. Yonge has managed to give a sufficiently detailed account of the achievements, and a not unsatisfactory idea of the character, of the subject of his memoir, as well as the spirit and feeling which actuated him in all the concerns and every act of his life. There is no pretension about the style, but it is neither dry and cold nor wholly devoid of that illustration which is necessary to redeem the flatness almost inevitable in biographical narration, supposing the writer to be, all in all, prosaic and matter of fact. Some advantages Mr. Yonge has obtained which give value to his book. The present Duke of Wellington readily answered a great variety of questions put to him by the author at different times, on points on which he was at a loss for accurate information; and his Grace has permitted him to print in an appendix the important memorandum on the battle of Waterloo drawn up by his illustrious father, as a commentary on the well-known narrative of General Clausewitz. To Lord Colchester the author is indebted for the use of a very copious political diary kept by the late Lord of that name; Mr. Algernon Greville, the Duke's private secretary for many years, has afforded much valuable information relating to his private habits; Lady Carmichael Smyth has contributed a sketch of the entire plan of the battle of Waterloo, taken in September, 1814, by the Duke's orders, and used by him for the battle in 1815, a facsimile of a portion of which, with the Duke's own pencil-marks on it, is given in the first volume. The list of acknowledgments to persons whose information and assistance has been afforded to the author contains many other names which are in themselves a guarantee for the worth of the materials which they have lent towards the completeness of the work. It will, perhaps, suffice, after the above statements, to add that on the whole, looking to its probable purpose, and to the mode in which it is executed, this book carries with it merit enough to justify its recommendation to the reader.

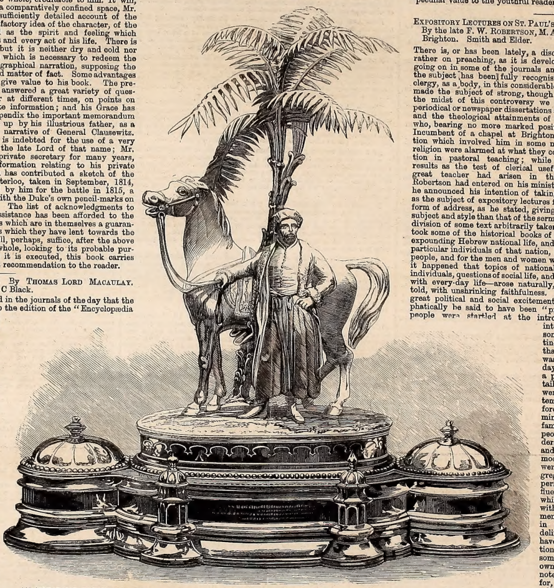
William Pitt: a Biography. By Thomas Lord Macaulay. A. and C Black.

A statement has recently appeared in the journals of the day that the late Lord Macaulay contributed to the edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" now in progress of publication by Messrs. Black, of Edinburgh, several biographies. Among them is that of William Pitt. By the favour of Messrs. Black we have been put in possession of that paper, which, we believe, has not yet been published. It need hardly be said that the narrative of the life of a statesman with whom it may be supposed Lord Macaulay had no especial sympathies is marked by all the knowledge of details and all the brilliancy of style which characterise the writer; but it is also marked by an impartiality and an appreciation of the qualities of the subject of the memoir which renders it entirely gratifying and satisfactory to peruse. The space afforded to the memoir is necessarily contracted; but ample use is made of the comparatively few pages which are devoted to the narrative of a life not very long in years, but occupying a large portion—reference being had to its influence and importance—in the history of this country. In three sentences, the state of Europe, of England, almost of the world, at the time of the birth of the second William Pitt, the second son of the great statesman who bore the same name, of whom it is said that, whatever might have been the vicissitudes of his public life, he never failed to find peace and love by his own hearth. He loved all his children, and was loved by them; but of all his children the one of whom he was fondest and proudest was his second son. It is easy to imagine how Macaulay narrates the mode in which this cherished child's genius and ambition displayed themselves with a rare and almost unnatural precocity; how at seven years old he took an interest in the gravest subjects, pursued his studies with ardour, and made remarks on books and events with a sense and vivacity which amazed his parents and instructors. At fourteen the lad was in intellect a man. Before that he had written a tragedy which is still preserved at the family seat, and which is stated to be in some respects highly curious. There is in it no love; the whole plot is political; and it is remarkable that the interest, such as it is, turns on a contest about a regency—on one side is a faithful servant of the Crown, on the other an ambitious and unprincipled conspirator. At length the King, who had been missing, reappears, resumes his power, and rewards the faithful defender of his rights. "A reader," says Lord Macaulay, "who should judge only by internal evidence would have no hesitation in pronouncing that the play was written by some Pittite poetaster at the time of the rejoicings for the recovery of George III. in 1789." One more specimen of the attention to detail which we have remarked in the essay is to be found in the account of the apprehensions with regard to young Pitt's health, which seriously alloyed the pleasure felt by his parents at the rapid development of his intellectual powers. We are told that "he shot up alarmingly fast; he was often ill, and always weak; and it was feared that it would be impossible to rear a stripling so tall, so slender, and so feeble. Port wine was prescribed by his medical advisers, and it is said that he was at fourteen accustomed to take this agreeable physic in quantities which would in our abstemious age be thought much more than sufficient for any full-grown man. This regimen, though it would probably have killed ninety-nine boys out of a hundred, seems to have been well suited to the peculiarities of William's constitution, for at fifteen he ceased to be molested by disease, and, though never a strong man, continued, during many years of labour and anxiety, of nights passed in debate, and of summers passed in London, to be a tolerably healthy one."

It would be supererogation amounting almost to offence to attempt to describe the manner in which Lord Macaulay has written this chapter of the History of England. How he has traced events and illustrated character and motive it is easy to conjecture: he has made familiar anecdotes seem nearly new by the spirit with which they are told; and admiration of the wonderful qualities which made Pitt at the completion of his twenty-fifth year the greatest subject that England had seen during many generations is not grudged, far less withheld, by a writer who, as a politican, is obliged to state that Pitt's triumphs were won in opposition to the whole influence of that party which the Fitzwilliams, the Russells, and the Cavendishes represented in the country and in Parliament. Up to this time of Pitt's career the narrative is almost minute. At this point, as is stated, a full history of his life would be a history of England, or rather of the whole civilised world. Thenceforth the relation is more in the nature of a sketch; but that it is a sketch by a master-hand it is almost impertinent to add. In the following terms a great historical writer sums up his estimate of the character of a statesman who bears a great name in history. This is the concluding passage of the biography of William Pitt by Thomas Macaulay:—

The memory of Pitt has been assailed, times innumerable, often unjustly; but it has suffered much less from his assailants than from his eulogists. For, during many years, his name was the rallying cry of a class of men with whom, at one of those terrible conjunctures which confound all ordinary distinctions, he was accidentally and temporarily connected, but to whom, on almost all great questions of principle, he was diametrically opposed. The haters of Parliamentary Reform called themselves Pittites, not choosing to remember that Pitt made three motions for Parliamentary Reform, and that, though he thought that such a reform could not safely be made while the passions excited by the French Revolution were raging, he never uttered a word indicating that he should not be prepared at a more convenient season to bring the question forward a fourth time. The toast of Protestant ascendency was drunk on Pitt's birthday by a set of Pittites who could not but be aware that Pitt had resigned his office because he could not carry Catholic Emancipation. The defenders of the Test Act called themselves Pittites, though they could not be ignorant that Pitt had laid before George III. unanswerable reasons for abolishing the Test Act. The enemies of free trade called themselves Pittites, though Pitt was far more deeply imbued with the doctrines of Adam Smith than Fox or Grey. The very negro-drivers invoked the name of Pitt, whose eloquence was never more conspicuously displayed than when he spoke of the wrongs of the negro. This mythical Pitt, who resembles the genuine Pitt as little as the Charlemagne of Ariosto resembles the Charlemagne of Eginhard, has had his day. History will vindicate the real man from calumny disguised under the semblance of adulation, and will exhibit him as what he was, a Minister of great talents, honest intentions, and liberal opinions, pre-eminently qualified, intellectually and morally, for the part of a Parliamentary leader, and capable of administering with prudence and moderation the Government of a prosperous and tranquil country, but unequal to surprising and terrible emergencies, and liable, in such emergencies, to err grievously, both on the side of weakness and on the side of violence.

The Career, Last Voyage, and Fate of Captain Sir John Franklin. By Captain Sherard Osborn, R.N., C.B. Bradbury and Evans.



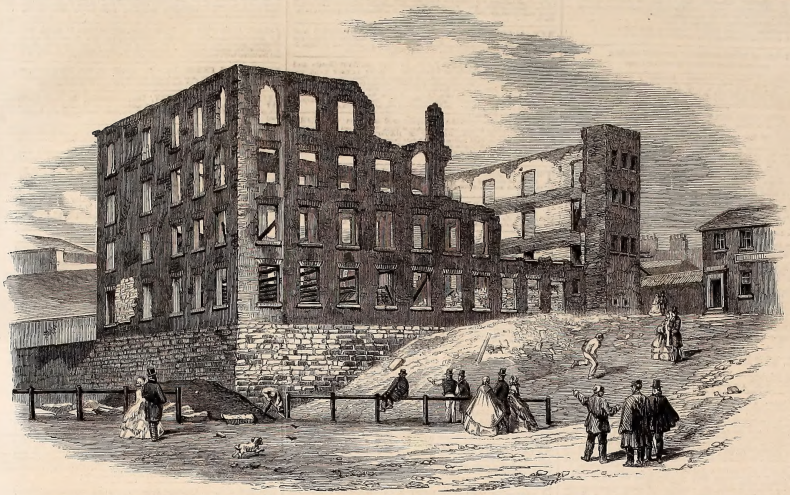
Few persons will probably be found to question Captain Sherard Osborn's fitness to be a chronicler of Arctic adventure. Himself a distinguished partaker in the dangers and trials of that service, he can best appreciate the qualities of the man of whose life he treats in the little volume before us. The subject-matter of the work is divided into three sections, comprising respectively "The Career of Franklin," his "Last Voyage," and the "Search for Franklin," and the whole is a reprint from the weekly periodical entitled Once a Week. There is no one but must concur with Captain Osborn when he states that there cannot be a better or a more noble career placed before the youth of England, and especially before her sailors, as an example and encouragement, than that of the gallant, devoted officer whose services he has sketched. In all things, and under all circumstances, as he truly states, Franklin stands sans peur et sans reproche. He carved out his own high reputation by hard labour, zeal, and self-sacrifice, and was indebted neither to the interest of friends nor to social position for attaining to his fame. Combining the highest qualilies of hand and head, Franklin laboured equally in the field of battle and in the field of maritime discovery; and it is in the double character of naval hero, as depicted in these pages, and distinguished navigator, that he may be said to stand almost alone in our history. These assertions are, to our mind, found proved in the excellent little work which has been published in its present shape with every circumstance of appropriateness.

Echoes from the Harp of France. Matilda of Normandy. By Harriet M. Carey, of Rozel. Saunders, Otley, and Co.

These are two graceful and interesting productions from the pen of a lady who is fast obtaining position among the female authors of the day. The "Echoes from the Harp of France" was, the title states, originally published by Mr. G. S. Trebutien at Caen, and many of the poems which form the volume relate to Normandy, for which Mrs. Carey has evidently a strong predilection, and where she appears to have many literary friends. She could have hardly chosen a better region to celebrate, for Normandy, the cradle of England's greatness, and truly great in itself, is a land of learning and song—the land par excellence of history, poetry, and romance. Among the contents of the book we would particularly call attention to "The Bridal Delayed," "Maurice and Eugenie," and "The Queen of England's Visit to Normandy." The prose notes on various French poets at the end of the work are a well-written and useful addition to it.——The other of these publications of Mrs. Carey, "Matilda of Normandy," is a romantic tale in verse, having for theme the time and family of William the Conqueror, and his admirable consort, Queen Matilda. The lines throughout, and especially those on husband's worth, and wife, and home, display power and pathos. As an historic poem "Matilda" is one of peculiar value to the youthful reader.

Expository Lectures on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. By the late F. W. Robertson, M. A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton. Smith and Elder.

There is, or has been lately, a discussion on pulpit eloquence, or rather on preaching, as it is developed in the Church of England, going on in some of the journals and reviews. The importance of the subject has been fully recognised, and the deficiencies of the clergy, as a body, in this considerable branch of their duty has been made the subject of strong, though not unfriendly, comment. In the midst of this controversy we have seen in more than one periodical or newspaper dissertations and notices on the pulpit powers and the theological attainments of the Rev. Frederick Robertson, who, bearing no more marked position in the Church than that of Incumbent of a chapel at Brighton, achieved for himself a position which involved him in some notoriety. Rigid professors of religion were alarmed at what they conceived to be a daring innovation in pastoral teaching; while those who looked more to results as the test of clerical usefulness were persuaded that a great teacher had arisen in the Church. Soon after Mr. Robertson had entered on his ministry at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, he announced his intention of taking one of the books of Scripture as the subject of expository lectures for the Sunday afternoons; this form of address, as he stated, giving him greater freedom both in subject and style than that of the sermon, with its critical or historical division of some text arbitrarily taken as a prefix. On this plan he took some of the historical books of the Old Testament, and, while expounding Hebrew national life, and incidentally the experiences of particular individuals of that nation, he drew lessons for the English people, and for the men and women whom he was addressing. Thus it happened that topics of national policy—so far as bearing on individuals, questions of social life, and of morals as they are connected with every-day life—arose naturally, and were treated, as we are told, with unshrinking faithfulness. The period (1848) was one of great political and social excitement, and these lectures may emphatically be said to have been "preaching to the times." Some people were startled at the introduction of secular subjects into the pulpit, but Mr. Robertson refused to recognise the distinction so drawn. He urged that the whole life of a Christian was sacred; that common every-day duties, whether of a trade or a profession, or the minuter details of a woman's household life, were the arenas in which trial and temptation arose, and that, therefore, it became the Christian minister's duty to enter into this familiar working life with his people, and to help them to understand its meaning, its trials, and its compensations. This mode of teaching and its value were fully recognised by his congregation; and it was at this period, moreover, that an influence little less than marvellous which Mr. Robertson attained to with the working classes commenced. The expository lectures in the volume before us were delivered on this plan, and they have been prepared for publication, with some difficulty and some incompleteness, from his own notes and some shorthand notes taken by different persons; for, although he furnished himself with full notes of all the leading divisions of most of these lectures, in the minor divisions a single word was often all that was written to guide his thoughts in the extempore delivery of each discourse. It would not be fitting to enter into the subject-matter of this book in the pages of this Journal, but it is noticed on the ground that it is a valuable record of the opinions and habits of thought of a man of remarkable powers, and remarkable for the mode in which those powers were developed, and with regard to whom, whatever difference of opinion in other respects there may be, all who knew him, or of him, are ready to admit that he was thoroughly and conscientiously in earnest in the work to which he devoted a life too short for any adequate fulfilment of his designs and aspirations.



AN INKSTAND PRESENTED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO M. TCHOKAR, OF BUCHAREST, FOR HIS HOSPITALITY TO SIR HENRY BULWER.

TESTIMONIAL TO A WALLACHIAN GENTLEMAN BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

While Sir Henry Bulwer was at Bucharest, in the capacity of British Commissioner in the Danubian Principalities, he was invited to take up his abode at the residence of M. Tchokar, a public-spirited and wealthy citizen of the Wallachian capital. This act of courtesy has now been acknowledged by the British Government by the presentation to M. Tchokar of a magnificent silver inkstand, of the value of 200 guineas. It consists of a finely-modeled group, in frosted silver, of a Wallachian Boyard in the national costume, with his steed standing beneath a palm-tree, emblematical of peace. At each extremity of the oval plinth are two circular cups, with covers in burnished silver, to receive the inkglasses. At the back of the plinth is the Royal arms of England, and on the front the subjoined inscription:—"Presented to M. Tchokar, by Sir Henry Bulwer, on the part of the British Government, as an acknowledgment of the courteous and hospitable manner in which he placed his house at the disposal of the British Commissioner at Bucharest in the year 1857." The inkstand was manufactured by Mr. Hancock, of Bruton-street and Bond-street, from the designs of Mr. Marshall Wood.

Mr. Cobden.—The following statement appears in the Athenæum:—"The public will regret to hear a rumour that Mr. Cobden has lost nearly the whole of his private fortune by investment in American railway shares. They will rejoice, however, if the rumour should be true, to hear that the loss will be repaired to this useful servant of the public, in a manner at once splendid, delicate, and prompt. In a few days, if we are rightly told, names have been put down for £40,000, in sums from £500 to £5000 each. The friendliness thus expressed is a most noble tribute to public virtue and public service."

THE RUINS OF SWALLOW-STREET FACTORY, BLACKBURN, RECENTLY DESTROYED BY FIRE.

BURNING OF A COTTON-MILL.

A MOST disastrous conflagration took place at Blackburn on Thursday, the 12th inst., by which the Swallow-street spinning-mill of Mr. Henry Ward, manufacturer, of Whittle and Blackburn, was totally destroyed. The fire was discovered in the second story of the mill about four o'clock in the morning. In the course of half an hour the corporation fire-engines were on the spot, but the flames had assumed such magnitude that the brigade contented themselves by using their efforts to save the adjoining valuable property, consisting of a warehouse or storeroom, weaving-shed, engine-house, &c., and in this duty they were perfectly successful. At five o'clock the roof of the mill fell in with a terrible crash, and a fierce flame shot up simultaneously and illuminated the entire neighbourhood, rendering the sky one mass of flames, which was visible for about fifteen or twenty miles. Then followed a rapid destruction of the floor and portions of the walls. At six o'clock the building was completely gutted, and at seven only the larger portions of the walls were left standing, the beams which they had hitherto supported being in flames. About noon the whole fire was extinguished, not, however, before the costly mill, with its 26,000 spindles, was utterly destroyed. The origin of the fire is unknown; and, although a night watchman was employed on the premises, he does not seem to have given the alarm or to have been cognisant of the fire. Our Engravings are from Photographs by W. Howson, New Market-street, Blackburn.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1869.

THE Parliamentary Session of 1869 being inaugurated, the finance statement appointed for the 6th of February, and the Reform Bill for the 20th, England once more addresses herself to her own business, having been undertaking the business of other people in the most sedulous manner for the last six months. There is a sort of sensation of comfort, or at all events of right doing, in pushing aside the maps of Italy and Sardinia, and pulling down our own ledger, or consulting those ancient charts of our own islands. John Bull gets very cosmopolitan in the long run, but finds that he has expanded and improved his mind quite enough towards February, and, like Paterfamilias after a long and not inexpensive tour, is inclined to hide away his felt hat and Parmesan, and shelve "Murray" and "The Art of French Conversation." Now for our own home bills—and some of them are likely to be large ones. Now for our new Ways and Means, and Mr. Gladstone's mellifluous eloquence to prove that the more taxes we pay the better for us, and the more evidence of our national prosperity. Army and Navy and general defences are mentioned in the Queen's Speech, and they mean a good deal. We are not let into all that amiable mystery of Armstrong guns, just now, for nothing. And then there is a host of small but not unimportant things to be attended to. A much-wanted bankruptcy reform must be carried; the church-rate question must be adjusted, not the less that Archdeacon Denison says, by way of encouraging Convocation, that if an Irish bill can be rejected this year it will never be tried again. Then the Corporation of London has to be very mildly dealt with, but still something must be done to it. And before the Session is out there must be a review of the Indian mutiny and its suppression, for which task is coming home, and many voices the thanks of Parliament. Then there is the revision of the Bible to be resisted and the revision of the Prayer Book to be discussed. Then Protestantism of the Spooner type is to be evoked in the Irish Church Establishment, and this time under more favourable auspices than usual, for the conduct of the Irish prelates has been such as to prepare the Saxon mind to receive with favour any castigation of the system that produces such men. All this makes a very good paper of agenda for the next six months; and Parliament should turn to work with a will, and discharge as far as possible unprofitable chatter. This homily is preached to the Legislature at the beginning of every Session; we can only hope that this time it may be less unprofitable than usual.

Lord Palmerston announces that the commercial treaty with France is actually signed, and we may expect to see it immediately. With its reception in France we have little to do; it was not to be expected that the parties interested in prohibitions would take free-trade teaching more calmly than did our own Protectionists in days when our neighbours. England was going to be ruined then—France is going to be ruined now. England is now exulting in her prosperity—France may expect the same thing if she will only keep her hands off swords and cannon, and act cordially and honestly. The treaty is not the result of a treaty be acceptable or not, the idea of obtaining French goods, and particularly French wines, at a reduced price, gives much satisfaction, though we are asked to make our concessions at once, and the European war is to be made left to itself. The more necessary to one another two countries can become the less chance of foolish falling out; it is as in the matrimonial relation;—couples with large houses and everything done for them can afford to quarrel; but couples who live in the same set of rooms and on limited means and daily fare, find that they must be on the best terms, and a real quarrel between them would be inconvenient and ridiculous. If England is always filling the coalcastle for France, and France is always filling the wineglass for England, neither will like to break the ties of the alliance.

There is no foreign news of much importance. The Sardinian Monarch (to whom the Cavour Ministry is now restored) is casting his new Italian money, and the liberation of Italy in 1860 will thereby become a fact for all ages. Medals disappear, records become dull, and money remains. Then the piece of coin dropped into some lurking-place a couple of thousand years hence is found ready with its evidence for or against the history that has been compiled in its absence. The fact of the new Sardinian coinage—the withdrawal of the Archbishop of Paris from the Council of Rome, in consequence of his refusal to the Emperor's Church reforms—and the slight progress of the unpromising campaign in Morocco, are the only points that appear to require notice. From America we learn that a Speaker was still wanted for the House of Representatives, that the Democratic majority of all the divisions held the largest number of votes, they were a few short of the required number. The slaveowners of Maryland have made a cool proposition. There are a great many free negroes in that State—some thousands. The planters say that these are very objectionable people—idle themselves, and inclined to tempt the slaves to idleness; and, therefore, it is proposed that these evil free men shall at once be declared slaves and sold for the good of the State!

Hardly does the death of a single private individual excite such a sensation of regret as has been caused by the lamentable casualty that has deprived the Great Eastern of her gallant and skilful captain. He has died in his duty, and his last act was a desperate struggle to do that duty for those around him. We say, without impropriety, express a hope that the sorrow that has been expressed for the fate of Captain Harrison will take the form of sympathy with those whom he has left behind, by no means adequately secured against "the meaner storms of life," and that a testimonial subscription-list, which is in preparation, will be largely filled.

Political business now abridges the reports of the courts of law and other domestic institutions. A few cases of interest "crop out," as the geologists say. The curious fact that Sir John Romilly, descendant of one of the families expelled from France by the Revocation, should have had, as Master of the Rolls, to sit in judgment in an important Church dispute among the other descendants of those refugees, is well worth noting. There has been an inner raking for Scotland Yard skeletons, and the public excitement among the theoretically-theological people—the question whether the authorities of the Free Kirk have power to deal, irresponsibly, with the ministers of that Kirk. For simply appealing to the archbishop of not unjust decisions of the Kirk a minister has been deposed, but the law has stepped in to curb the priest, and to declare that an irresponsible yet recognised tribunal is not an institution for a civilised era. Westminster Judges have corrected the singular notion of some country justices that milk is agricultural produce, and therefore toll free. And a jury has given £30 damages to an actor under circumstances worth the notice of all interested in theatrical matters. A manager, on his own showing, engaged a performer for the "run" of a particular piece, and then quarrelled with disputes this, and claims, and gets, several weeks' salary; but this is merely a question of credibility, the point of interest being the endeavour by the manager to introduce the system of engaging an artist "by the job." Anything more detrimental to the educational career of an artist can hardly be conceived; and it is further objectionable as giving an actor a right to select and refuse parts (for, if hired for a "run," he will naturally try to see that the run is likely to last)—a power which he ought not to have, and which, where it is conceded, he almost always exercises in the most unwise manner.

THE COURT.

The Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, accompanied by Princesses Alice and Helena, left Windsor Castle on Monday morning, attended by the Lords and Ladies of the Royal household, and proceeded to the Windsor station of the Great Weste n Railway, whence a special train conveyed the illustrious party to the Paddington terminus. Her Majesty was escorted by a detachment of light dragoons to Buckingham Palace, where the Queen and Prince Consort arrived at four minutes before twelve o'clock.

The Queen held a Court and Privy Council at three o'clock. M. Tricoupi, the Greek Minister, had an audience, and presented to her Majesty an autograph letter from the Sovereign. Mr. Henry C. Howard, her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Hanover, had an audience of leave of the Queen. At the Council, the Queen's Speech on opening the Session of Parliament was approved of. The new Great Seal of England was delivered by her Majesty in Council, to the Lord Chancellor, and delivered to the custody of the Lord Chancellor. The old seal, by the Queen's command, was defaced. Her Majesty ordered the last of the writs for the counties of England and Wales for the present year.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, opened the Session of Parliament with a Speech from the throne. Princesses Alice and Helena were present in the Royal gallery of the House of Lords. Parliament. At five o'clock the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Princesses Alice and Helena, arrived at Windsor, attended by the Royal household. At Buckingham Palace for Windsor Castle, where her Majesty arrived at a quarter before six. There was no addition to the Royal dinner party in the evening.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Consort walked in the Home Park, and visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. Her Royal Highness paid a visit to her Majesty in the afternoon at the Castle. His Highness the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh arrived on a visit to her Majesty.

Lord Rivers and Major-General Sir Henry Ramsay have succeeded Viscount Torrington and Lieutenant-Colonel F. Cavendish as the Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Queen. Colonel Charles Fitzroy has succeeded Colonel F. H. Seymour as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen.

On Thursday the Queen, with her Royal Highness Prince of Wales, walked in the Home Park and visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. The Prince Consort, accompanied by the Marquis of Abercorn, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Augustus Hamilton Seymour, enjoyed the sport of shooting in the Royal preserves.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary, attended by Lady Geraldine Somerset and Lieutenant-Colonel Home Purves, have returned to Cambridge House, Piccadilly, from visits to the Earl and Countess of Clarendon at the Grove, near Watford, and Lord Marton Alford at Ashridge Park.

The Duchess of Sutherland arrived at Stafford House on Saturday evening, for the purpose of attending her Majesty at the opening of Parliament as Mistress of the Robes.

The Duke and Duchess of Wellington have arrived at Apsley House, from Strathfieldsaye, Hants.

The Earl and Countess of Derby and Lady Emma Stanley arrived in St. James's-square on Saturday from Knowsley in Lancashire.

Earl Granville, Lord President of the Privy Council, gave a dinner on Saturday, at his residence in Bruton-street, to the Cabinet Ministers and great officers of state of the Queen's household.

Viscount Combermere was prevented coming to town to attend her Majesty on Saturday last, at the opening of Parliament, by indisposition. The Viscountess has also, we regret to learn, been suffering for some weeks from rheumatic fever.

The mortal remains of the late Lord Londesborough were removed from Curzon House-terrace on Saturday, via the Great Northern Railway, to Grimston Park, the seat of Lord Hotham, in Yorkshire.

A marriage is about to take place between Lady Mary Pleydell Bouverie, youngest daughter of the Earl of Radnor, and the Hon. Thomas Wilde, Q.C., brother to Lord Truro.

Her Majesty was habited at the opening of Parliament, on Tuesday, in a dress of pearl-coloured silk with gold lace, over which she wore a mantle of rich crimson velvet, with a deep and massive gold border. Her head-dress was a tiara of diamonds. The Prince Consort wore the uniform of a Colonel of the Life Guards. The elder Princess wore a slip of white tulle over a pink blue under-dress, and had her hair in a cluster of white roses. The younger Princess was dressed wholly in white, with a wreath of pink flowers as a head-dress.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

St. Paul's Church, Haggerston, will be consecrated on Monday next, the 25th inst., by the Lord Bishop of London.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has fixed Wednesday, the 23rd of May next, for the celebration of the two hundred and sixth anniversary festival of the Sons of the Clergy, under the deans of St. Paul's Cathedral. The Master of Merchant Taylors' School, the Rev. [illegible] Dr. Morgan, the Curate of St. David's Church, Merthyr Tydvil, was, on the 10th inst., presented by his friends with a massive gold watch and purse, and on his leaving for his new living.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Rev. E. H. Paget to be Rector of Stuston, Suffolk; Rev. C. Townley, Vicar of Little Leigh, to be Rural Dean in the Chorlton by-the-Green Deanery of Leeds; Rev. R. J. Cuppage to be incumbent of St. John's, Glasgow; Rev. R. C. M. Jones to be Perpetual Curate of Christ Church, Leeds; Rev. F. G. H. Smith to be Perpetual Curate of Holy Trinity, Leeds; Rev. C. D. Cumming to be Curate of Thurnscoe, Worsborough; Rev. [illegible] de P. Gilman to be Curate of Walcot, Bath; Rev. G. T. Ryves to be Curate of Poole, Bath.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, LEVENSHULME, a substantial stone-built edifice, in the transition style between the Early English and Decorated, was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Manchester last Saturday afternoon, there being a large congregation present. The Bishop read the service in appropriate sermon from Haggai, ii. 9—"The glory of this latter house shall be greater than that of the former, saith the Lord of Hosts; and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of Hosts." At the close of the ceremony the Rev. E. C. Hoyle, the appointed clergyman, was formally invested through the customary form of "reading in," and the service terminated shortly afterwards.

ST. CLEMENT DANES.—The Rev. R. Henry Killick, the new Rector of this important parish, has issued an address to his parishioners. He expresses his anxiety that the pastoral relations between him and the parish shall be for their mutual benefit, each fulfilling the requirements needful for that end. He looks for sympathy, advice, and help from those who are faithful Churchmen and consistent Christians; and exhorts others who, though calling themselves Churchmen, are cold and indifferent in their Christian duties, to join in the great work to be accomplished, inviting, also, the co-operation of those who dissent from the Church in all things that concern the general welfare. He expresses a hope that Subbath-breaking, habitual drunkenness, and profane language, will find no place in his willingness to attend in cases where personal visits may be desired.

CONVOCATION.—The sixth Convocation of the Province of Canterbury was opened on Wednesday. In the Upper House the Bishops had to deal with the question of consecrated churchyards, and after a formal sitting, they adjourned till February. In the Lower House there were reports relative to educational, missionary, and educational services, and to ecclesiastical dilapidations. A resolution proposed by Archdeacon Hale and seconded by Archdeacon Denison was to the effect that the Bishops should be petitioned to oppose church-rate repeal in the House of Lords, or to endeavour to devise a remedy. The resolution was passed, and the Lower House also adjourned till February, when the reports which we have quoted will be considered.—The Rev. Frederick Proctor, &c., assembled Convocation on Wednesday at York Minster—the Dean presiding as the Commissioner of the Archbishop. No subscription was required from the Proctors. They to proceed to business, the Dean remarked that petitions would be received, but they were not allowed to be read. After the reading of the petitions, Convocation was prorogued until the 16th of August. The whole proceedings did not occupy more than a few minutes.

Miss Agnes Baillie, sister of the late Joanna and Dr. Baillie, is still flourishing in her villa at Hampstead, and is now in her hundredth year.

Richard Hutchins, jun., Esq., shipowner, of Bristol, has forwarded a subscription of £5 (to be continued annually) to the Royal National Life-boat Institution.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated in the House of Commons on Wednesday that he will bring on his Budget on the 6th of February, at which time the provisions of the commercial treaty between England and France will be made known.

ROOFS OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT AS VIEWED FROM THE VICTORIA TOWER.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

VIEW OF THE NEW PALACE OF WESTMINSTER,
TAKEN FROM THE VICTORIA TOWER.

We are enabled to present our readers with a View of the New Palace of Westminster, from the Victoria Tower, through the courtesy of Mr. Thomas Quarm, who possesses the only photograph yet taken of the vast pile wherein our senators meet. We have in this view a distant peep of Somerset House and Waterloo-bridge, with the shot towers on its Lambeth side, and nearer lies the old bridge of Westminster as it appeared just prior to the driving of the piles for the new bridge. In the centre of the view is the great octagon, or central tower, from which the various corridors seem to run like arteries in the human frame, so innumerable are they. In the distant end of the building is seen the great Clock Tower, with a small turret, or ventilating intervening shaft. At the base of the Clock Tower are seen the houses forming Palace-yard, and the dining-house near the steps leading to Bridge-street. The long parade of the Palace looking west is in sharp perspective. The broad front before us joins the main building, with old Westminster Hall. The cluster of turrets on the right of the central hall, but in the distant angle, surmounts the princely official residence of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the line of roof that runs to the next block of buildings covers one third of the river front. The block just mentioned, if we may so term it, is one of two blocks which flank the centre of the river front, and is turreted like the angle of the Speaker's residence. Thus we have more than one-half of the entire Palace seen in one glance. The difficulty of procuring a clear view was so great that more than a fortnight elapsed ere it was accomplished, and for this purpose the operator slept in the Victoria Tower. It should be observed that at the time this view was taken the Victoria Tower was not quite finished, and the apparatus was put upon one of the stages; such another opportunity will not occur again, and much praise is due to Mr. Quarm for seizing the moment, for certainly nothing could give a clearer idea of the vastness of the work than this view.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN 1741-2.

We are enabled to offer to the readers of our Journal an Engraving from a sketch of a debate in the House of Commons in the Session of 1741-2. Any one who has seen a large picture of Sir George Hayter which hangs in one of the committee-rooms of the present House, and which represents the moving of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, on the meeting of Parliament after the general election which followed the passing of the Reform Bill, will recognise the identity of features which exists between that picture and our Engraving. The House, its arrangements, fitting-up, and all its general characteristics, are the same (the old St. Stephen's): the only difference is in the dresses of the members, and the circumstance that the Speaker wears his hat, which he never does now, although every other member is entitled to do so, as long as he remains sitting. In those days of large perukes there was no distinction between the head-dress of the Speaker and that of the other members whereas now the right honourable gentleman's appearance is strongly marked by the use of a large or, to speak technically, full-bottomed wig. In the Engraving the chair is represented as being filled by the Right Honourable Arthur Onslow, and Sir Robert Walpole, the Prime Minister, is supposed to be speaking from the place which was then, as it is now, occupied by the leader of the House. We are indebted to John South Phillips, Esq., of Great Barton, Bury St. Edmunds, for the print from which our illustration is taken.

SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The curious old print from which the Engraving of the House of Commons in 1741-42, on the preceding page, was taken, contains in its margin a list of the Speakers from 1727, which we transfer to our columns, completing it to the present time.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT BY HER MAJESTY IN PERSON.

On Tuesday the Queen in person opened the second Session of the sixth Parliament of her reign. The ceremonial, always one of splendour, was beyond comparison the most brilliant which has been witnessed for many years; the suspicious state of national affairs adding materially to the interest of the scene and to the enthusiasm of the people.

Flags and streamers of all kinds were hoisted along the line of route in honour of her Majesty's visit to the Royal Palace at Westminster. The Government offices in Pall Mall, Royal, the Treasury, and other public buildings presented an animated appearance, while the private residences, which a glimpse of the Royal pageant could be caught was crammed with people, eleven o'clock were anxious to display at once their patriotism and their loyalty. From an early hour in the morning the bells of St. Martin's Church (the Royal parish) sent forth hearty peals; and from St. Margaret's Church (the Parish Church) similar sounds were heard.

At about twenty minutes past one a Royal salute of twenty-one guns announced that her Majesty had entered her State carriage at Buckingham Palace. At this time the scene in the Park was a remarkable one. The large open space in front of Buckingham Palace was crowded with people, as was the whole of the road right away to the Horse Guards. In another minute or two the gates were unbolted, and amidst the cheers of the multitudes, carrying the Pages of Honour, the Equerries, the Maids of Honour, the Ladies of the Bedchamber, the Lord Chamberlain (the Earl of Clarendon), D'Eresby), the Vice-Chamberlain (Viscount Castlereagh), the Lord Steward (the Earl of St. Germans), the Keeper of the Privy Purse (Colonel the Hon. Sir C. B. Phipps), the Master of the Household (Colonel T. M. Biddulph), and other officers of the Queen's household, and some of the principal officers of the Royal family.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort were in the Royal carriage, which was, as usual, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses. In the same carriage were the Princess of Prussia, the Princess of the Netherlands, and the Princess Alice, Mistress of the Robes.

The carriage from Buckingham Palace to the House was most enthusiastic.

In the House of Lords a brilliant assemblage waited the arrival of her Majesty. The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at one o'clock precisely; the members of the diplomatic corps mustered in full force, radiant with attire and glittering with orders. The peers were in their robes, and their robes. Suddenly there was a flourish of trumpets, and a messenger entered and announced that her Majesty was coming—an order which was followed by throwing off their cloaks, producing a charming effect by the sudden transition from the sombre to the purest and white mantles to a glittering array of varied colours. The new arrivals were the Princesses Alice and Helena, who saluted the assembly, and seated themselves on the woolsack at the bar, preceded by the Speaker in his state robes. The Lord Chancellor then handed the Speech to the Queen, which her Majesty read with her usual clear and sonorous enunciation. The Royal Speech is given on the first page.

At the close of the proceedings her Majesty returned to the Palace; the Speaker and members of the Commons retired from the bar; and their Lordships adjo rned to five o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

On the House resuming, at five o'clock,

The Lord Chancellor said the Queen's Speech, which was afterwards also read by the Clerk at the table.

THE ADDRESS TO THE CROWN.

The Address in answer to her Majesty's Speech was moved by Earl Fitzwilliam and seconded by Lord Talbot.

Earl Grey expressed his strong disapproval of the commercial treaty with France. Such an engagement ought not to be hazarded in the present condition of our finances, and the advantages which it would lead to on the side of France were not sufficient to compensate. Nothing, he thought that the House ought to have been summoned before information had been received from the Indian Government.

The Duke of Newcastle contended that, according to precedent, there was a necessity for summoning the Legislature, and instanced cases in which expeditions had been sent during the recess before the meeting of Parliament. He entirely expressed his hope that the amendment would be withdrawn, as no satisfactory reason had been advanced before the House for its adoption.

Lord Brougham deprecated any foreign interference in the affairs of India, and expressed his belief that Indians should be left to work out their own freedom in their own fashion.

The Earl of Malmesbury was not prepared to say that the treaty with France was a subject of congratulation, or that it might not disappoint the expectations formed; but, with regard to the Indian question, he ventured to hope that the policy of non-intervention would be followed by the Government, and that it would meet with her Majesty's present advisers. He could not concur with Earl Grey as to the late loans committed by the Government and called Parliament together at an earlier period before prosecuting hostilities against Chiba, and should therefore support the amendment.

Earl Granville having replied on the part of the Government,

The amendment was put and negatived.

The Address then was agreed to, and a Committee appointed to draw it up for presentation to her Majesty.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The members began to assemble at about one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker took the chair at twenty minutes to two o'clock, and, after prayers, the Queen's Speech was communicated by the Commissioners, and not obtain admission to the House of Lords will be so good as to observe silence in the outer lobby. The Speech was then read by the Speaker. There are many gracious Speech from the throne became voices from the lobby are distinctly heard in the body of the House.

At twenty minutes past two Colonel Clifford, Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, appeared at the bar, and was also graciously pleased to attend upon her Majesty in the House of Peers. On returning the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Sir George Lewis gave notice that on Monday next he would bring in a Bill to amend the constitution of the city of London.

Lord John Russell laid on the table the basis of the new commercial treaty between England and France.

Mr. Drand gave notice that on Monday, the 26th of February, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton would ask leave to bring in a Bill to amend the representation of the people.

Lord John Manners announced his intention to move on Tuesday week for a list of the names of the Volunteer Corps which had sent in returns.

Mr. Brooker intimated that on the 7th of February he would move for a bill to repeal the annual grant to the Royal College of Maynooth.

Colonel Sibthorp and Mr. Henley also gave notice of bills to amend the system of endowed schools; by Sir John Trelawny, for the abolition of church rates; and by Mr. Locke King, for the better regulation of election practices at elections.

Mr. Cowper and Mr. Lindsay respectively gave notice of motions on the subject of the shipping interest.

Mr. Vernon Smith gave notice of motion to bring in a bill to assimilate the probate duty on real property and personality.

THE ADDRESS.

Mr. St. Aubyn then moved the Address to the Crown in reply to the Royal Speech. The hon. gentleman briefly reviewed the principal points to which the Speech referred, and which he considered met with the approval of the sagacious and statesmanlike policy which had characterised the conduct of the Administration during the past year. The treaty of peace was an important and critical period in the history of Europe.

Lord Hotham seconded the Address, and congratulated the House and the country upon the suspicious circumstances under which Parliament had been summoned to meet. He was glad to find that the manner in the conduct of public affairs had been instructed to an Administration possessed of such strength, and which had proved itself equal to the arduous task of maintaining the peace of England. With regard to Reform, he hoped it would be found practicable to effect a satisfactory arrangement, and that large masses of the respectable labouring classes might be admitted to the privilege of the franchise.

Mr. Disraeli complimented Mr. St. Aubyn on his graceful and ingenuous speech, which, he said, had not only exhibited the eulogistic effort of the noble Lord who had followed him. It was not the disposition of the Opposition to offer any factious resistance to the Address, as at the same time they considered that the gracious Speech of the Sovereign was unsatisfactory in many respects, while some of the topics omitted were those on which the party who now sat upon the Ministerial benches made it a matter of accustomed and annual complaint. He alluded to Reform. He could not see how a place in the Royal and appropriate Speech could be found for a measure that they did not occupy a position than its predecessor. This showed how much more difficult a more conspicuous critical than any which had preceded it. The proposal to be made by the House he was prepared to say, on the part of himself and his friends, to receive that measure in a friendly manner, and such assistance as they could bring to render it such a measure as the country would be content to adopt would be given on that question. Referring to the new commercial treaty with France, the right hon. gentleman said that he was not prepared to say that the principle of reciprocity appeared to be entirely overlooked, and reminded the House that only two years ago the Emperor of the French had submitted a proposition to the departmental Parliaments of France embodying that principle of commercial intercourse. The Indian question was one which he hoped her Majesty's Government would deem it to be their duty to submit to Parliament at the earliest period at less consistent with the late Government maintained and Majesty's present Ministers. There was no reason why Parliament should not, course, unless a case were made out to the contrary, be summoned before the usual period of February. It was that, in August last, when Parliament was sitting, Lord John Russell had made a statement in that House respecting the intelligence of the affairs of Italy. It was true that papers on the subject were promised; but it was the duty of Ministers to state their intentions in the meantime, and to promise papers at the beginning of a Session and to produce them at the end. There was no reason why Parliament should not have been summoned, and already been published by the French Government. He would be glad to know what were the steps which had been taken for intervening in the affairs of Italy. This was a question upon which the British mind had a right to expect explanation. The noble Lord had stated that the Emperor of the French the only conclusion he could arrive at on the subject was the less we meddled with the Italian question the better.

Lord Palmerston replied to the right hon. gentleman, and, in answer to his assertion that no explanation had been given of the intentions of the Government with regard to the affairs of Italy. It was true that papers on the subject were promised; but it would be impossible to lay that information before the House. With regard to the Indian question, he could not promise papers at the beginning of a Session and to produce them at the end. There was no reason why Parliament should not have been summoned before the usual period of February, however, that the discussion would not be without advantage.

Mr. Disraeli replied, and

Mr. Disraeli replied, and

Mr. Bernal Osborne took the oaths and his seat for the Borough of Liskeard.

Frightful Proposition in St. George's-in-the-East.—Mr. Rutler presented a petition from the inhabitants of St. George's-in-the-East complaining of the character of the measure which had been introduced into the House of Lords by the Rev. Bryan King, and praying for some remedy for the removal of the evils which existed in that parish. The petition was read.—Mr. Danby Seymer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the attention of Government had been directed to bring forward for the relief of parishioners in cases where the incumbent of a living did not perform the duties of the parish.—Mr. Walpole, representing those of the Church of Rome that they did not oblige him to leave the Church of England, but that he was desirous of preventing the grievance of the parishioners, on conscientious motives, from attending his ministration of those services not authorised by the Church. He should be glad to have the great objections of the parishioners were not so much against the doctrines preached from the pulpit as against the practices in which those doctrines were performed. The Government were not prepared to introduce any measure on the subject, but he should be glad to hear that the parishioners' suggestions enough to frame a bill that would prevent the continuance of the practices complained of in the parish.

New Writ.—On the motion of Mr. Bramne, a new writ for Scarborough was ordered in the room of Mr. Denison, now Speaker of the London borough.

Bribery at Elections.—Mr. Corbett gave notice of his intention, on Thursday, the 2nd of February, to move that the Attorney-General be instructed to prepare a bill for the more effectual repeal of the statute 2 Edward VI. for bribery at the last election for the borough of Beverley.

Lord Viscount Castlereagh and Lord Harry Vane called attention to a speech recently made by the Commander of the Forces in Scotland, in which he alluded to the Volunteer movement, and they therefore asked whether the Government had taken any notice of the circumstance of such language being uttered by an official so high in command as the speaker.

Mr. S. Herbert was sorry that Lord Melville had made such an observation. The Commander-in-Chief was also grieved that it had been made, and Lord Melville in his reply expressed his regret at having made the observation and hoped that it would not be considered in an answer to a proposal made to him to give some aid to the volunteer force.

Petitions of Right.—Mr. Bouverie gave notice to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to petitions of right, to simplify the proceedings, and to make provision for costs in certain cases. The object of the bill was to enable successful suitors to recover costs from the Throne.

Her Majesty's Answer.—Mr. Speaker stated that he had brought down the Queen's reply to the Address of the House. Her Majesty said—"I have received with pleasure your Address. The object of which you speak I, and it will be my constant endeavour to improve the law, extend the commerce, and advance the prosperity of my people."

Exposed Schools.—Mr. Dillwyn obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the law relating to exposed schools.

ADJOURNMENT ON FRIDAYS.

Mr. Bouverie moved a resolution declaring that when the House adjourned on Friday it should stand adjourned until the following Monday, unless it was previously otherwise determined—the object of the resolution being to prevent the practice of counting out the House at its meeting on Friday a motion that the House at its rising should adjourn until Monday; and that the numerous members who were desirous of leaving town might on that day frequently made the opportunity, to the serious obstruction of the business of the country.

Mr. E. Miles called upon independent members to oppose the motion, as they considered to deprive them of a valuable privilege, which was seldom abused.

Mr. E. James also opposed the motion on similar grounds.

Mr. Dering thought the proposition which were forward on the adjournment of the House on Fridays might be better disposed of at other times, and he should vote against it.

Lord C. Hamilton opposed the motion.

Mr. Disraeli was of opinion it would be better to trust to the good sense of hon. members in such matters than to rules and regulations; although he admitted the patience of the House was sometimes a little tested.

Sir G. C. Lewis concurred to a considerable extent in the opinions expressed by Mr. Disraeli; but said that, under the present system of legislations, private members, at all events before Easter, had a great advantage over the Government in bringing forward their motions and bills for leave and notices before the House. As a means of facilitating the Government business he proposed that Tuesdays and Thursdays should be devoted as they should be given up to them, and also that a limit should be made to the time at which questions should be put to the Ministers of the Crown.

Lord Palmerston recommended the withdrawal of the motion, hoping, however, that the discussion would not be without advantage.

Mr. Bouverie, after explanation, consented to withdraw his motion.

The House then divided, when the proposition was negatived by a majority of 166 to 48.

SEATS VACANT THROUGH BRIBERY.

Mr. Collins moved for a return of all seats declared vacant for bribery no new writs should be issued without two days' notice being previously given.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Collins moved that no new writs should not be issued for the boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield, where corruption was reported to have extensively prevailed, until seven days' notice being previously given.

Lord Hotham inquired whether any proceedings had been instituted against the bribers and the parties bribed in the boroughs referred to?

Sir G. C. Lewis said that the case of Gloucester and Wakefield was not yet completed; and, with regard to Gloucester, he was not at all prepared to say that proceedings would not be instituted.

Mr. B. James thought the commissions would be a more farce if ulterior steps were not taken.

Sir F. Kelly said the reports of the Commissioners ought to be presented in some way or another, and steps be taken to prevent or punish such corruption in future.

Mr. Bright urged the expediency of suspending the constitutional rights of Wakefield and Gloucester for a considerable period, in order to put an end to the wholesale system of bribery which had prevailed there. At the same time he must express his surprise that, with such a pressure of bribery as had been put upon them, only about 100 out of 800 voters in Wakefield had actually received bribes. Such a state of things was disgraceful to the borough. Such practices were a disgrace to the country; but what was worse, they might be exposed that they would never be put an end to except by the ballot (Cheers).

Mr. Gray concurred in the opinion expressed by Mr. Bright as to the suspension of the writs for a considerable time.

Lord R. Cecil said the source of the evil was that the franchise had been extended to people who were so poor that they were pleased at being bribed; and whether voting were open or secret he believed the result would be the same.

Lord John Russell further discussion, in which Mr. Miller, Mr. Malins, Mr. Williams, and Mr. Collins took part,

Sir G. C. Lewis said the Commissioners for Gloucester condemned in strong terms the Corrupt Practices at Elections Act as being nugatory and useless. The Government had under their consideration a measure for amending that Act as well as the procedure in the trial of election petitions.

The motion was then agreed to.

Mr. HADFIELD obtained leave to bring in a bill to render it unnecessary to make and subscribe certain declarations as a qualification for offices and employments.

THE SAVINGS BANKS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in a Committee on the Consolidated Fund, moved the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to create a charge upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in respect of the sums due to savings banks and friendly societies, and to provide for the payment of interest thereon to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; and also to make provision out of the said Consolidated Fund, or by Exchequer Bills or Exchequer Bonds, for any difference which may now or hereafter exist between the assets in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt in respect of savings banks and friendly societies, and the liabilities therein, and for the interest on such Exchequer Bills or Exchequer Bonds; and also to authorise the cancelling of such amounts of the several capital stocks of annuities held by the said Commissioners for savings banks and friendly societies respectively as may appear to the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to be expedient, and for the creation of like amounts of capital stock, bearing a lower rate of interest than the capital stocks so cancelled, and for paying the interest on the stock so created." The object of the bill in contemplation was to limit the powers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of dealing with something like £39,000,000, and that the whole of the transactions of the Finance Minister and the other Commissioners in reference to those funds should be brought periodically under the consideration of Parliament.

After some conversation the resolution was agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY CHANGES DURING THE RECESS.—Sir Arthur Buller has been elected for Devonport, in the room of the Right Hon. James Wilson, appointed to the Controllership of the Finances of India; Mr. J. Wyld has been elected for Bodmin, in the room of Dr. Mitchell, who, it will be remembered, accepted the Chiltern Hundreds at the close of last Session; Mr. Bernal Osborne has been elected for Liskeard, in the room of Mr. R. W. Grey, appointed one of the Commissioners of Customs; Mr. J. Somes has been elected for Hull, in the room of Mr. J. Hoare, unseated in July; Mr. D. C. Marjoribanks has been elected for Berwick, in the room of Mr. R. Earle, who accepted the Chiltern Hundreds at the close of last Session; Sir Baldwin Leighton has been elected for South Shropshire, in the room of the Hon. R. W. Clive, deceased; Sir James Ferguson has been elected for Ayrshire, in the room of Lord James Stuart, deceased; Mr. H. S. Thompson has been elected for Whitby, in the room of Mr. Stephenson, deceased; Sir F. H. Goldsmid has been elected for Reading, in the room of Sir H. S. Keating, appointed one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas; Mr. J. G. Blencowe has been elected for Lewes, in the room of the Right Hon. H. Fitzroy, deceased; and Mr. Atherton has been re-elected for Durham, on his appointment as Solicitor-General. In consequence of the death of the Earl of Camperdown, Viscount Duncan resigns his seat for Forfarshire, and the representation of that county is at present vacant. The seat for Pontefract is also vacant, by reason of the retirement of Mr. W. Overend, in accordance with the award of Sir J. Coleridge; and the city of Norwich, and the boroughs of Gloucester, Wakefield, and Beverley, are at present unrepresented, their late members having been unseated on petition, and no writs having been issued to authorise fresh elections. The result of the elections just recapitulated has been slightly to increase the strength of the Liberal party.

FATAL BOAT ACCIDENT.—DEATH OF CAPTAIN HARRISON OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

A lamentable boat accident, involving the death of Captain Harrison and two other persons connected with the Great Eastern steam-ship, occurred off Southampton on Saturday last. Captain Harrison started from Hythe for Southampton on Saturday morning in the gig of the Great Eastern, accompanied by Dr. Watson, surgeon of the ship; Captain Lay, superintendent purser; his son, a youth nine years of age; the coxswain, and five of the crew.

Captain Harrison sat in the sternsheets at the helm. During the run across the boat, though rather wet, behaved well, but as it neared the opposite side, and the land opened out, the squall increased fearfully. The tide was very high, though just beginning to set out of the docks against the wind, making a chopping, dangerous sea run high and broken, and which appeared to get worse each moment. Through this the boat bore stoutly up, sending the foam from her bows, though her yawing increased so that her helm scarcely controlled her at all. When she got into the channel between the Indus and the docks the chopping sea was worse than ever. Captain Harrison gave orders to stand by with the halyards, and immediately afterwards to down with the sail. The order was at once obeyed by the crew, but both the sail and halyards were wet through; neither moved freely, and the sail, after coming down a foot, stuck fast. The rest occurred in a minute. The boat had still way enough on her to take her abreast of the opening to the docks, when a counter-eddy of wind struck her on the opposite tack. The sail instantly "jibbed," as it is termed—that is to say, the canvas was forced back against the mast, and the boat, heeling over on the side on which most of the crew were sitting, filled and turned over. Dr. Watson, who exerted himself energetically to save others, and who was himself picked up exhausted and insensible, says that in the first moment all went down together underneath the gig, but almost immediately afterwards, as it appeared to him, they rose to the surface. The spray from the sea was wild and stifling, the water deadly cold, and for a moment or so, of course, none could say what happened. Dr. Watson, who swims as well as poor Captain Harrison did, struck out and seized the younger Lay. While doing so he saw Captain Harrison also striking out for the boat, which was pitching about keel uppermost, and called to him to make for the boat and hold on, to which Captain Harrison replied, "All right, all right!" Always cool and collected, no matter what his danger, Captain Harrison then seized the boat and made a desperate attempt to right it; but it was filled with water, and turned over so completely as to rise again with the keel uppermost still. Between this movement of the boat and the fury of the sea Dr. Watson was separated from young Lay and the boat for an interval. After a while, however, he again succeeded in catching the poor lad and jamming him in between himself and the stern of the boat, on to which he held with one hand, while with the other he tried to support Captain Harrison, who was buffeting strongly with the waves, by keeping his hand under his arm. In this manner some minutes passed, and Captain Harrison seemed almost powerless, and to be becoming insensible. After a short while, however, he again threw himself on the keel of the boat and strove to turn it over. The struggle, however, was, like the first, ineffectual, and seemed to exhaust his strength, for he relaxed his hold, threw his arms up, and fell back in the waves, after which Dr. Watson saw him no more.

Two boats had put off from the Indus, with two from the docks, and one from a cutter named the Fawn, almost immediately that the accident was seen. The boats from the docks picked up poor Captain Harrison, who was floating about a foot below the surface of the water with his head and feet doubled together, and his arm cast loosely over an oar. When lifted out he had been, it is supposed, about twelve minutes under water, and his body was perfectly cold and dead; not a sign of animation could be discovered. He was immediately carried to the shore, and placed in one of the new houses of the docks, where there was a large fire; but, though Dr. Watson, Dr. Chapman, Dr. Wiblin, and many other medical gentlemen were instantly in attendance, and every possible method was used to restore animation for upwards of an hour and a half, including the application of a galvanic battery, all efforts were fruitless, and he never moved or gave a sign of life.

The body of the younger Lay was not found till late in the afternoon. Ogden, the coxswain, was picked up near Captain Harrison. He, after a long time, was restored to consciousness, but, when he heard that Captain Harrison was dead, he gradually sank, and died the same evening at eight o'clock.

An inquest was held the same afternoon, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death." They were particularly desirous of expressing their deep sorrow at the loss sustained in the death of Captain Harrison, who had greatly endeared himself to the people of Southampton during his residence there, and who was justly regarded as an amiable and honourable gentleman, a kindhearted and sincere friend, and a skilful member of his profession.

The remains of Captain Harrison were removed on Thursday to Liverpool, to be buried on Friday in a family vault, in which two of his children are interred. The Mayor of Southampton called a special meeting of the council on Wednesday, to consider the best mode of testifying the respect of the Corporation for the deceased gentleman, and of offering its condolence with the sorrowing widow and family at Southampton. The feeling of regret at Captain Harrison's untimely fate is deep and universal. Flags floated at half-mast from all the public and many private buildings in the town, and from some of the ships in port. On Thursday the church bells rang a muffled peal at eight o'clock in the morning, from half-past one till three o'clock (during which time the body of Captain Harrison was being removed from his late residence to the railway terminus), and again at eight o'clock in the evening; and minute guns were fired from the platform battery from two till three o'clock. The tradesmen of the town closed their establishments the Captain's remains were being conveyed to the railway station.

In our account last week of the two hospital-ships Melbourne and Mauritius we omitted to state that the outfit of the dispensary department connected with those vessels was intrusted to Messrs. Savory and Moore, of Bond-street, and that all the poisonous medicines are contained in their patent safeguard bottles.

The following regiments of militia will be immediately disembodied:—The Antrim Rifles, North Cork, City of Dublin, County of Limerick, 5th Middlesex (Elthorne), Oxfordshire, 2nd Stafford, and 3rd West York. By the 1st of April—the commencement of the financial year—it is expected, says the Army and Navy Gazette, that the whole of the militia will be disembodied.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

IN literature what is new? The Queen—her Majesty's Speech of course. But in what approved language of England is the Speech written? By what standard shall it be tried? We will undertake to say that her Majesty (if left to herself) would have written and spoken (considering the words, she could not)—a better speech than her Ministers made for her. Are we, said a scholar fresh from "Panizzi's Museum," externally to hear, and more largely still to read, continual paragraphs about nothing, naturally leading to nothing? This mystery in mysterious English, in a Speech from the Throne—how is it to be accounted for? It is not her Majesty's fault.

> The Queen, 'tis said, hath lost a part
> Of her entirely English heart,

Dean Swift said, in verse, of Queen Anne, alluding (Mr. Yates will pardon the parenthesis for Lord Chancellor Clarendon's sake) to the first speech from the throne which Queen Victoria's Queen Anne addressed to the Parliament of the people of England. The speech from the throne is a conglomeration and false consolidation of paragraphs of indifferent and adulterated English—meant to disguise, and therefore telling nothing. But why not tell truth in monosyllables? The Queen—God bless her!—has spoken the paragraphs—laboured and long-lengthened—which her Ministers made for her. If we are not in need of a Reform Bill we are certainly in need of a reform of speeches from the throne. Why should each Secretary of State send in his paragraph of alliance or disalliance, of dissatisfaction or apology, without such paragraphs undergoing the revisal of some one—what one? Why, a man like the editor of the Times. Sir Spencer Compton, when King George II. called him in, was never in greater need of a great speech-composer (English included) than Lord Palmerston seems to have been in, when he summoned any one but Swift or Southey to his house in Piccadilly.

There are two good articles, in every respect, in the present number of the Quarterly Review. They are by different writers. That on cotton-spinning—full of new matter—is by Smiles; that on Cowper, who wrote "The Task" and "John Gilpin," is by Elwyn, the editor of the Review. Both good. That by Elwyn on Cowper is so much to the point that Southey (very improperly) abused by the Quarterly of past quarters) would have read it—and nodded approval.

Thus far for literature this week. In art we have to lament the not-unexpected death of Sir William Ross—the man whose miniatures will preserve in exquisite art, and to many generations, the beauty of the Court of Queen Victoria. Was he as good, in his line, as Holbein or Hilliard, or Hoskins or Cooper, or Vertue or Zincke?—perhaps not. Was he as good as Thorburn?—Mr. Thorburn will forgive us—in many respects better. Ross rose from lifelike-size figures into miniatures. Mr. Thorburn fell from miniatures—in which he excelled and still excels—into pictures which had better not have been painted.

The father of the House of Lords in England is the son of an American who came to England—painted portraits and historical pieces—gained money—put his son to the law, and died foreseeing what his son was to be—not Lord Chancellor, as he has been, but the first speaker, by position and by talent, in the House of Lords. This man is Lord Lyndhurst. Our American brethren when Lyndhurst dies (we hope not soon) will of course erect statues to his memory. He well deserves every honour of the Peerage of England—and—of what?—the filial admiration of the United States.

Since the Royal George sank at Spithead—long before her Majesty was dreamt of—no touching calamity of a like nature, and yet unlike, has occurred on the coast of England than the death of Harrison. Kempenfeldt went down with twice four hundred men over against Spithead; over against Southampton—Harrison went down in a cockboat. The Royal George, commanded by Kempenfeldt, was a cockle-shell compared with the Great Eastern. That the well-skilled captain of the Great Eastern should die as he died! that Kempenfeldt should have died as he died!

We have had for nothing French plays in five acts, said a wit; now—we are to have French wines at a next-to-nothing price. We lost our drama through France, and now we are to lose our beer. Cannot Lord Elcho bring together a volunteer corps of Barclay v. Bordeaux?

It is pleasant to learn (we thought we had done with literature) that Messrs. Adam and Charles Black are about to reprint the biographical essays which Lord Macaulay wrote for that admirable work, the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It is not every one who can, unhappily, afford to buy the Black Encyclopædia; but the essays by Macaulay on Bunyan, on Goldsmith, and on Johnson will in the coming reprint be within the reach of almost all readers. Mr. Adam Black is busy with a preface to the work.

Sir James Prior, whose diligence gave us so much that was new about Goldsmith, is to give us, we are glad to learn, a life of Edmond Malone, the editor of Shakspeare, the editor of Dryden's prose works, and additionally a benefactor to the world by the bequest of his rarer books to the Bodleian Library. Malone was a gentleman and a scholar, and the world should know more about him. By way of last word read, dear reader of this column of Talk, an article on Hogarth in the second number of the Cornhill Magazine is by Mr. Sala, and has, if we mistake not, a flavour of Mr. Thackeray about it.

Two life-boats are to be placed at the back of the Isle of Wight, one at Brooke and the other at Grange Chine. The cost of these boats will be £700. The Life-boat Institution will subscribe £350 towards it, and the rest is to be made up by public subscription in the island. The latter amounts at the present time to nearly £300.

DUPLICATE TITLES IN THE BRITISH PEERAGE.—There is a Duke of Devonshire and an Earl of Devon, there is a Lord Hastings and a Marquis of Hastings, there is a Lord Gifford and an Earl of Gifford, there is a Lord Downe and a Lord Downes, there is an Earl of Winton and a Marquis of Winchester, there is a Lord Bruce and an Earl Bruce, a Lord Strafford and a Marquis of Stafford, an Earl of Strafford and a Lord Stafford (Viscount Enfield), an Earl Fortescue and a Lord Fortescue (Viscount Ebrington), two Lords Stewart, two Lords Stuart, a Lord Sudeley and a Lord Sudley, a Duke of Hamilton and a Lord Hamilton, an Earl of Morton and a Lord Moreton, a Lord Ponsonby and a Lord Ponsonby of Imokilly, a Lord Forbes of Scotland and a Viscount Forbes of Ireland, an Earl Grey and a Lord Gray, a Lord Monteagle and a Lord Mounteagle, and until very recently there was a Lord Holland as well as a Lord Lovell and Holland, and an Earl Talbot as well as a Lord Talbot de Malahide. There is still a Lord Stanley of Bickerstaffe and a Lord Stanley of Alderley; and if Mr. Scrope of Danby, should succeed this year in establishing his claim to that ancient title, there will be two rival Earls of Wiltshire.

PREVENTION OF BRIBERY.—Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P., has addressed a letter to Lord Brougham on a proposed bill for the prevention of bribery and the amendment of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854. If all payments at elections—he argues—could be made through one respectable person, there would be an end of corruption. Let such a person be appointed by the Judges from among the barristers, and this point is gained. Then let every candidate and every elected member swear that he has never paid, and never will pay, and has never authorised, and never will authorise, directly or indirectly, the payment of any money except to the election auditor. If any person pays any money for the purposes of the election except through the election auditor he is to be punishable as in the case of perjury—that is, by penal servitude; be held disqualified for any office under the Crown, or for being a member or elector of Parliament. The agents to whom the auditor disburses his money are to account to him on oath, and will therefore, of course, account truly. Such is Sir Fitzroy Kelly's plan.

MUSIC.

Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison have reappeared at the Royal English Opera after a considerable interval of relaxation, during which our fair prima donna's voice, which had suffered greatly before the Christmas holidays from over-exertion, has fully recovered its power and freshness. The opera of Wednesday evening was "The Crown Diamonds," which went off with the utmost brilliancy and success. We may now look for two novelties promised at this theatre—Mr. Henry Leslie's opera on the subject of Turpin the highwayman, and Mr. Vincent Wallace's "Lurline," which has been long expected.

The "Popular Concert" of Monday last was remarkable chiefly for the beautiful playing of our accomplished pianist Herr Pauer, whose performance of Hummel's sonata in F minor, and Hadyn's trio in G major for the piano, violin, and violoncello (in which he was accompanied by Sainton and Piatti), delighted the audience. The compositions of the immortal Hadyn, the father of modern instrumental music, are by far too much neglected nowadays, and we were glad to find one of them revived on this occasion. Two quartets, the one by Spohr, the other by Beethoven, were admirably executed; and several classical vocal pieces were well sung by Miss Theresa Jefferys and Miss Palmer.

The proceedings of the annual meeting of the Sacred Harmonic Society on Monday last gave a very favourable view of the present state of that great body. The subscription-list of the past year is considerably in advance of any former period. The ordinary expenditure of the year amounted to the great sum of £13,147. The expenditure on account of the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace was £15,236, and the receipts £34,921—leaving a surplus of £19,685 divisible between the Crystal Palace Company and the Sacred Harmonic Society, the latter body receiving one-third of the amount. Another festival at the Crystal Palace is in contemplation, to take place in the summer of 1862. The Sacred Harmonic Society now possesses a funded property of £2000, besides one of the noblest musical libraries in Europe.

The Glasgow Musical Festival has been held this week, beginning on Tuesday, when "Elijah" was performed by a vocal and instrumental orchestra containing above five hundred performers. The solo singers were Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Miss Witham, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Winn. The instrumental band consisted of the most eminent London performers, chiefly those belonging to the Philharmonic Society. The oratorios performed on the subsequent days were "The Messiah," and "Gideon," a new work composed by Mr. Charles Horsley expressly for this festival.

THE THEATRES, &c.

DRURY LANE.—On Monday a lady from the United States was introduced to these boards, in the piece entitled "In and Out of Place," which affords an opportunity for the débutante appearing in a variety of characters. The name of the new actress is Miss Julia Daly; and her success, so far as Yankee character is concerned, was complete. Her Irish assumption was much less perfect; and, altogether, she may be accepted as another example of the Williams-Florence school. The lady was much indebted for her success to the admirable manner in which she was assisted by Mr. Tilbury.

NEW ADELPHI.—Mr. Webster reappeared on Monday week in the character of Robert Landry in "The Dead Heart," and was greeted with a full house. This ingenious drama still continues attractive, and is likely for some time to hold possession of the bills. Its success, however, is greatly due to Mr. Webster's delineation of the much-injured and deeply-suffering hero.

SURREY.—A new piece was produced on Monday which bears a striking resemblance to "The Dead Heart," just mentioned. There is, however, it appears, no real connection between the pieces, the present having been taken from a French drama entitled "La Comtesse de Noailles." This drama contains a story scarcely susceptible of adaptation for the English boards; but Mr. Parselle has contrived to cleanse it of much objectionable matter, and to place it on our stage in a not unacceptable shape. This drama depends more upon its story than upon its dramatic development. With the exception of Joseph Gombert, the characters are but skeletons, and the incidents merely indications. The natural result is that the plot is obscure and the dialogue noticeably deficient in language. Mr. Creswick's part in Joseph Gombert offered some salient points, and the different situations gave him opportunities for effect, of which he very artistically availed himself. The conversations, however, are throughout too much on the drawing room level, and for the proper exhibition of passion no space is left by the rapidity of the events. The change that occurs in the character of the Countess (Miss Edith Heraud) in the dénouement affords two or three sentences which are above the dead level of the ordinary dialogue. Of these the actress took judicious advantage, and, by a sudden and powerful expression of feeling, extorted the applause of the audience. The house was crowded to excess; nevertheless, the new drama, intricate as it is, was listened to with profound attention, and excited evident interest.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Mr. T. Stamford Raffles has been appointed stipendiary magistrate at Liverpool, in the room of Mr. Mansfield.

On Tuesday morning a tremendous storm burst over Portsmouth before daylight, with thunder, lightning, hail, and rain. The flashes were most vivid and incessant, and the hail has done considerable damage.

The body of Mr. Massy O'Grady was discovered on Thursday week in a river that runs near New Pallas Station, in the county of Limerick. A coroner's jury has returned a verdict "That the deceased came by his death by drowning, while labouring under temporary insanity."

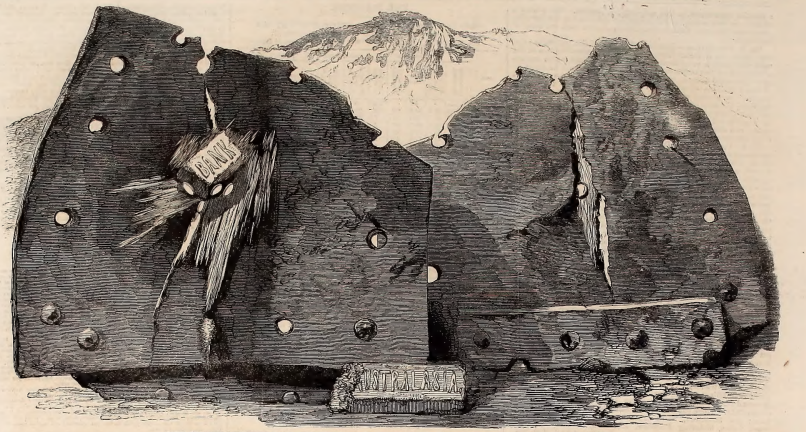
The Liverpool and Glasgow Chambers of Commerce have, like the Manchester Chamber, memorialised the Government in favour of the principle of securing in time of war the immunity from capture at sea of private property and the persons of private citizens.

On Wednesday se'nnight Messrs. Buchanan and Dalgleish, the members of Parliament for Glasgow, addressed a public meeting of the inhabitants in the City Hall, which was nearly filled, the audience being composed, to a large extent, of the working classes.

Upwards of a million and a half of mackerel were captured off the Isle of Wight during two days of last week. So great was the catch that many boats were obliged to let go their nets to save the vessels from being swamped.

On Tuesday night last an attempt was made to murder Mr. Jackson, the steward of J. Holmes, Esq., of Clogher, in the county of Roscommon. He was fired at as he was returning home. Several slugs entered his body, and he continues in a precarious state. The sufferer did not see the assassin, nor has he any idea who he may be, not having had any serious dispute with any person in the locality.

On Tuesday se'nnight last G. H. Whalley, Esq., one of the members for Peterborough, delivered an interesting lecture on "Early British History," at the Mechanics' Institute, before the president, Dr. Porter, and about 600 or 700 persons members of the institution and inhabitants of the city. At the conclusion a unanimous vote of thanks was tendered to the lecturer.



ROMAN CATHOLIC DEMONSTRATION IN NEWCASTLE.—A meeting, consisting of between 5000 and 6000 persons, assembled on Monday night in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Townhall, to express sympathy with the Pope—Dr. Hogarth, the so-called "Bishop of Hexham," occupying the chair. A series of resolutions were adopted expressing sympathy with the Pope, and the meeting concluded with the adoption of an address to his Holiness.

Edward Lane and Gordon Hires, the chief and second mates of the American ship Anna, who are charged with the murder of several seamen on the high seas, were again remanded by the Southampton magistrates on Tuesday. The remand was granted on the application of the American Consul, who has not yet been able to procure the proper requisition to enable him to send the prisoners home for trial.

During the storm on the morning of Sunday last an alarming fire broke out in the parish church of Sandbach, and, though every exertion was made to arrest the flames, damage was incurred to the amount of £500. The origin of the fire is stated to be traceable to a defective flue. At a meeting of the inhabitants of Sandbach it has been resolved immediately to restore the church by voluntary contributions.

GOLD NUGGET IMBEDDED IN A PLATE OF IRON RECOVERED FROM THE WRECK OF THE "ROYAL CHARTER."

GOLD NUGGET IMBEDDED IN A PLATE OF IRON.

THE fragment of iron of which we here give a representation is part of the unfortunate ship Royal Charter, wrecked on the 26th of October last, near Moelfra, Isle of Anglesea, on voyage from Melbourne to Liverpool. The mass of gold impacted in the fissure is part of an ingot of the purest quality imported, worth more than £4 an ounce. It was sent up in its present form from the wreck by divers employed in recovering the sunk treasure, who found the gold so firmly fixed that it was impossible to separate it from the iron. The remainder of the ingot, of which an Engraving is also given, was found subsequently near the same spot, and has been identified, together with nearly £200,000 worth of gold of the original shipment of about £320,000. When found by the divers the fragment of iron and wood was studded with sovereigns, the greater number of which were picked out under water before it had been found impossible to release the ingot; a few, however, still remain, as will be seen. The weight of the ingot is about 211 ounces, and it is worth about £860. A great quantity of the gold-dust on freight in the Royal Charter has also been recovered, the sand about the wreck being brought up and washed.

The total extent of treasure recovered from the wreck of the Royal Charter up to the 14th inst. has been 23 boxes of gold, 372 bars and ingots, and 57 broken pieces of gold; 14,888 half-sovereigns, 38lb. of gold nuggets, 275lb. gold-dust, 466 rupees, six shillings, a gold pin, and several small articles. All the boxes, and a great many of the bars of gold, bear the marks contained in the Royal Charter manifest, and no doubt can be entertained of their identity. The Royal Charter is stated to have had 40,000 sovereigns on board. The amount of gold she had on freight was £335,000, and the passengers, it is believed, had a further sum of gold amongst them to the extent of £120,000.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

THE prediction of the decrease in the amplitude of ladies' dresses in 1859 still remains unrealised, and the generally-condemned crinoline has not yet been compelled to hide its diminished head. We cannot tell to what we ought to attribute this persistence in enormous proportion, unless it be the ordinary difficulty of suppressing a bad custom; but we must record the fact that the more or less inflated tyrant still holds possession of its fair victims, who, often unconscious of their wrongs, now flock in all the plenitude of their greatness to the salons and balls which at present occupy the leisure of the élite of Parisian society. Congresses may be abandoned, political questions may agitate the public mind, social reforms of the highest importance may be proposed, but, through all the endless complications of such matters, the soirées of Paris still hold their own, and invite legions of Pleasure's devotees to the display of rich toilet in their gay dominions.

Dresses have undergone scarcely any change of form since our last article; if any variation is to be mentioned it is rather one of colour than of shape. The most delicate tints of orange, blue, violet, or gold colour are much in vogue; some are so doubtful with regard to shade as to render it difficult to assign to them an exact position in the prismatic catalogue; add to this the effect produced by a brilliant light, and those who love to doubt, and doubt, and doubt again, will have full opportunity for the exercise of their misgiving ingenuity. Velvet cloaks, mantles, and pardessus are much worn, ornamented with ruchings of moire-antique ribbon or with passementerie: of the form indicated in one of our Illustrations few can be more elegant or easy to the wearer. Besides the bonnets described below we have seen some all white—white lace curtain, white ribbons, white marabout or ostrich feather, and white lace tour de tête—of exquisite taste; others in which white prevails, but ornamented with a rich cherry-coloured or violet velvet band, with bow in centre, running quite across the forehead, and with velvet strings to match. Nothing can well surpass the grace of these bonnets, unless it be, to use a French compliment, that of the fair dames who wear them.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Plain robe of brocaded velvet, very ample in the skirt, and long and somewhat training behind. Mantle of black velvet, with cape descending to the bottom of the waist; the whole outline, both of the cape and of the rest of the mantle, is bordered with a ruching of dress moire-antique ribbon, which imparts a pleasing appearance to this easy-setting garment. The bonnet is of thin pale-blue velvet, with a double lace fall covering the bavolet; wide, blue strings, a shade or two deeper in colour than the body of the chapeau.

Fig. 2. Ball Costume.—Dress of gold-coloured silk and white tulle, the colours and materials alternating from the bottom flounce of silk upwards: there is an under-skirt of dark yellow tulle, which imparts a delicate gold tint to the entire robe. The corsage is décolleté en cœur and round-waisted, and is ornamented with a berthe composed of small flounces of white and gold coloured tulle: these little flounces are plaited and arranged so as to form a point at the shoulder, and they descend to the same distance down the front and the back of the corsage. The scarf, attached to the waist by a bow, is of white tulle, bordered with three rows of tulle, two of gold colour, and one white. The headdress is composed of deep yellow buds, intermingled with the hair in frizzled curls.

Fig. 3. Visiting Dress.—Dark grey velvet robe, trimmed with blue passementerie and blue satin. High plain waistcoat corsage, bordered round the edges with a double band of blue satin, and buttoned in front with buttons of blue passementerie. Pagoda sleeves, turned up with blue satin, edged with blue ruching. Descending from the shoulder is a sort of epaulet in passementerie, composed of guipure and aiguillettes. The skirt is quite plain, attached by large plaits behind, and in front by three large flat plaits on each side. Square lace collar. The globe-shaped undersleeves are of lace, terminated at the wrist by a close-fitting cuff. The bonnet is of blue velvet, ornamented with camellias of the same colour and material, white figured tulle, black lace, and white blonde. The tour de tête, of white, figured blonde, advances slightly towards the forehead, and the curtain is of velvet, bordered, as well as the velvet strings, with a narrow white blonde.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE five spring handicaps are all out, and, barring the conventional remarks on the absurdity of beginning the weights so far below 5st., merely to make the list look more flattering throughout, there is no outcry as to any horses being especially favoured. Viatka, 4st. 12lb., a thick, useful-looking daughter of Teddington, is pretty firm for the Chester Cup at 30 to 1, but ten points behind her companion, Longrange, 7st. 6lb., whom, if we mistake not, all John Scott's art will never make more than a third-class horse. Lupellus is becoming a capital third favourite for the Two Thousand, for which, as well the Derby, Umpire is somewhat out of favour. The whole of the Grimston stud will be put up by the late Lord's executors for sale. The horses in training consist of a couple of two-year-olds, Ellerton (brother to Ellington) and Gavazzi, on both of which upwards of a thousand reserve was put at Doncaster, and Summerside, the winner of the Oaks. These come up to Tattersall's in about a fortnight's time; and Stockwell, West Australian, Warlock, twenty-three brood mares, including Ellerdale, Ellermire, Ennui (the dam of Saunterer), Rosa Bonheur, Gildermire, Boarding-school Miss, &c., nearly all of them in foal; and fourteen yearlings, principally by Stockwell and West Australian, will be sold at the Grimston paddocks during May.

The hunting season so far has been a bad one, and the weather so changeable that very few packs have had regular sport. In Leicestershire, however, since the beginning of the year, the scent has been excellent. The Heythrop are having more sport than any hounds in Oxfordshire, and their 1h. 38m. from Boulter's Barn on the 9th of this month was a clipper, and only equalled by that of December 2 from Tangley. The Brocklesby had also a capital run of fourteen or fifteen miles on the former day from Swinhope House. Lord and Lady Worsley are very constant in the hunting-field, and their presence does much towards bringing back the memory of the old "Pelham days," when the musical halloo of the first Tom Smith was heard by the lads of the Brocklesby. The Duke of Rutland's had a good day on Saturday, and lost their second fox in sight of the Belvoir kennels, after a clipping hour. On Wednesday Mr. Tailby's had a magnificent run of 1h. 40m. from Martinthorpe Gorse, changing foxes at Normanton Park, and on to Exton Park, where the second was also lost. Melton Mowbray still continues to fill, and such sport may well tempt visitors. The principal days with the Quorn have been as follows:—Thursday, the 12th. Meet, Beaumanor, the seat of W. Herrick, Esq., where a large party were assembled, after the Loughborough ball. A fox was found in a gorse cover near the park, and had a narrow escape of being mobbed by footpeople. After running under several carriages he got away, the hounds close to him, and through Mr. Herrick's woods to Garrendon, across the park by Dishley to Hastern, where he was headed; and, crossing the park again, was run into near the Loughborough woods, after a capital hunting run: time, an hour and ten minutes. A second fox was found immediately, and lost close to Newtown village, near Bradgate, after a very good hunting-run of forty minutes.—Friday, the 13th. The meet, Wartnaby. Found in a wood not far from the meet, and ran to Shoby Scholes, where the hounds changed, and, after a ring of fifty minutes, at a very severe pace, crossed Shoby Scholes again, and ran to Lord Aylesford's Gorse; away again instantly, the fox making for Mundy's Gorse, by Ella's Gorse, Willoughby Gorse, and was killed in the open near Wysall, after a tremendously fast forty minutes without a check. The Countess of Stamford, Lord Stamford, the Duke of Rutland, Little Gilmour, Esq., Major Morgan, — Phillips, Esq., J. Storey, Esq., jun., Colonel Forester, — Biggs, Esq., and Treadwell, were amongst the few up at the finish, out of a very large field. This run was quite as fine as any the Quorn have had this season.—Friday, the 20th. A long hunting run of two hours and twenty minutes from Walton Thorns, with a very satisfactory finish, killing one fox near Widmerpool.—Monday, the 23rd. Meet, Loseby. Drew John o' Gaunt's, and found three foxes. Went away with one towards Tilton village, but could do no good, from the shameful way the hounds were overridden. Lord Stamford viewed a fox crossing the fields to the cover, and galloped back, and the hounds got away capitally with him. He took nearly the same line as in the former run from John o' Gaunt, crossing the Marfield brook, leaving Great Dalby to the right, on to Thorp Trussels, which he found too hot to hold him; went away by Ashby Village from there direct to Loseby, and was run to ground (dead beat) in a small plantation near Tilton: time, an hour and five minutes; distance 11½ miles, over the finest part of Leicestershire. Found a fox in Barkby Holt, and had a very good gallop for forty-seven minutes; the hounds were whipped off near Somerby, every one having had enough, and the fox making his point for Owston Wood. Thus ended a magnificent day's sport.

After his lecture in London to nearly 2000 genuine cabmen and omnibus-drivers, who received him most cordially, Mr. Rarey left London last week for Paris. Thence he has gone for three months to Egypt, to study the Arab mode of handling their horses. On his return he will, we believe, complete his cavalry contract, and pay a series of farewell visits in the autumn to the principal towns of the United Kingdom, and then embody in a work the leading facts of his horse-breaking experience in every part of the world.

The Liverpool Meeting brought out Lord Sefton's kennel in very great form, and three stakes out of the six fell to his lot, with three half-sisters by Skyrocket. Lord Grey de Wilton was again a winner with his dog Gil Blas; and some of the "Waterloo cracks," Regan and Java to wit, sadly disappointed their owners in the Members' Cup. Bloody Heart beat Greta, Silk and Scarlet, and Portland in succession, and then only succumbed to the winner after one no-go. Mr. Dalzell's judging was much cavilled at by nearly every one. The Kenilworth Club is fixed for Monday, the Cardington Club for Tuesday, &c., Henley in Arden for Wednesday, Ridgway Club (Lytham) for Thursday and Friday, and Eastnor for Friday.

The only classes of emigrants that can safely be said to be in regular demand at the Cape of Good Hope are agricultural labourers, male and female farm servants, and female domestic servants. There will also be a steady demand, during the progress of the Table Bay breakwater, the prisons and bridges, and other public works, for rough masons, carpenters, smiths, and other artisans connected with such operations.

The President of the United States, through the medium of the Liverpool Local Marine Board, has presented a gold chronometer and chain to Captain Williams, of the Imogene (British ship), who rescued and carried into Pernambuco the crew of the American ship Fleetwood, which was wrecked in the South Atlantic Ocean.

The Queen has appointed Henry Garnett, of Wyreside, Esq., to be Sheriff of the county palatine of Lancaster for the year ensuing.

In a case of embezzlement, which was on Saturday last submitted to the Paris Tribunal of Correctional Police, a curious disclosure was made—namely, that there exists at La Villette an establishment, which effects what it calls the "revivification" of coffee grounds, and, after mixing them with a small portion of pure coffee and other substances, sells them as coffee. Nay, more, that the "revivified" coffee grounds, after being used, are subjected to a new process of "revivification," being again mixed with other substances, and once more sold as pure coffee.

NEW CALEDONIA.—The following report on the state of the French colony in New Caledonia has been received from Porte de France:—"Though I have not visited the interior of the island, I will give you my opinion of the advantages and capabilities of this colony. The port is one of the finest in the world, and offers excellent anchorage for vessels of any tonnage. At present, however, it is rather difficult of access, owing to the want of signals and seamarks to show the passages between the chain of breakers which surrounds it. The vegetation of the country is most luxuriant, and comprises every kind of tropical produce. The sugar-cane is found in a wild state, and of a finer growth than I have found anywhere else. Some of the settlers have cultivated it on a small scale, the total absence of labourers preventing them from doing more. The island presents extensive and well-watered plains for pasturage, and in the upland districts plenty of water-power and mines of iron and coal. It is most desirable that emigrants should turn their attention to this colony, which, though in the torrid zone, enjoys a temperate climate, highly favourable to the health of Europeans. The vine flourishes in the island, and produces excellent grapes. Indeed, every plant cultivated for food in France succeeds as well or better there; and nothing is wanting but inhabitants to make New Caledonia one of the most flourishing colonies in the world."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

ALTHOUGH no change of importance has taken place in the value of National Stocks this week, the market almost generally has ruled very inactive. Sales have exceeded the purchases to some extent, and the premium on the Unfunded Debt has given way fully 2s. Considering that there is every prospect of a higher range in the value of money, that most of the Continental exchanges are unfavourable to this country, that large amounts in bullion have been withdrawn from the Bank of England for export purposes, and that specie shipments from the United States have almost ceased, surprise can scarcely be expressed at the present comparatively weak state of Consols.

The great activity in trade generally has led to an improved demand for money. In Lombard-street first-class short bills have been done at 2¾ to 3; three months', at 2⅞ to 3; four months', at 3¼ to 3½; and six months', at 3½ to 4 per cent. We may observe, however, that the majority of the billbrokers are indisposed to negotiate any but short first-class paper. In the Stock Exchange money has been in request at 2 per cent for short periods; but the Bank Directors have made no further change in their minimum.

The whole of the late imports of gold have been sent away, and about £250,000 has been purchased of the Bank for export purposes. The outgoing steamer with the Bombay mail takes £455,900, chiefly in silver. The total amount forwarded to the East this month is £1,715,637, the bulk being, we understand, to pay for rupee or "enfaced" paper.

The new Belgian loan of £1,800,000 has proved highly successful, the subscriptions exceeding the entire amount by several millions. The last instalment on the Three per Cent Russian Loan has been paid this week.

The sum of £100,000 has been received from the Turkish Minister of Finance by the Ottoman Bank, to meet the dividends for the redemption of the bonds lately cancelled. These bonds will be paid off on the 1st of March.

The directors of the Australian Agricultural Company have declared a dividend of £1 per share, free of income tax. The dividend of the North British Australasian Company is at the rate of 6¼ per cent per annum; of the National Bank, 14 per cent; of the National Discount Company, 5 per cent; and of the English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered Bank, 5 per cent per annum.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE (Friday).—We have again to report the arrival of a very moderate supply of English wheat, coastwise and by land-carriage. Although the show of samples was limited, the demand was in an inactive state. Fine dry samples sold at fully Monday's prices, but other kinds were a dull inquiry. No foreign wheat has come fresh to hand this week; but the supply of granaried samples was good. The firmness of holders checked operations; nevertheless, Monday's currency was supported. The inquiry for floating cargoes off Falmouth was much restricted. For nearly all kinds of barley—the show of which was limited—there was a fair demand at full quotations. New malt was firm in price, but old parcels were a dull inquiry. Oats moved off freely, and good sound corn was rather dearer. Beans and peas maintained late quotations, and the flour trade was tolerably firm.

Coffee.—The transactions are for the most part confined to immediate wants. In the general quotations scarcely any change has taken place.

Rice.—A fair average business is doing in most kinds. In prices, however, no alteration can be noticed.

Metropolitan Cattle Market (Monday, January 23.)—A fair average time-of-year supply of beasts was on offer in to-day's market. Nearly all breeds met a dull inquiry, at, in some instances, a decline in the quotations of 2d per 8lb. The extreme value of the best Scots was 4s. 10d. per 8lb. We were but moderately supplied with sheep, which moved off steadily, at full prices, the best old Downs having produced quite 5s. 6d per 8lb. "SPITHEAD: BOAT'S CREW RECOVERING AN ANCHOR." BY J. M. W. TURNER.

THE Collection of Turners belonging to the National Gallery have been arranged for temporary exhibition at the South Kensington Museum, where, with the advantages of space and a good light, they make a very different appearance to that which they presented on the badly-lighted walls of Marlborough House. Mr. Wornum, in the process of hanging, has taken pains to classify the pictures in historical order, so as to exemplify the distinct styles adopted by the painter at three different periods of his life, and the study of them under these conditions is very interesting. His early works exhibit great firmness and breadth, with conscientious finish, and, in some respects, take after Wilson in style. Later in life, from about 1802 to 1830, he displayed the effect of impressions obtained in Italian travel in a more daring and masterly execution, a greater brilliancy of colour, and an evident, though often in an obvious spirit of emulation of the mighty Claude. This is, undoubtedly, the best period, and amongst the works produced in it may be mentioned "Calais Pier," exhibited in 1803; "The Shipwreck," painted in 1805; the "Goddess of Discord Choosing the Apple of Contention in the Garden of the Hesperides," exhibited in 1806; the "Death of Nelson" (1808), "Spithead" (1809), "Apollo Killing the Python" (1811), "Crossing the Brook," an extensive landscape (1815), "England—Richmond Hill" (1819), "Rome, from the Vatican" (1820), and "Ulysses deriding Polyphemus" (1829). The last named may be taken as illustrating the transition period, when the artist began indulging in those dreams of color and prismatic effects in which during his later period he revelled almost to the exclusion of all other considerations, and frequently in a way to excite the irreverent smiles of the ignorant, and the regret of those who most admired the sterling qualities of his genius. Yet even during this later period he produced some grand works undisfigured by excesses of this character; as, for instance, the "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage—Italy;" "The Fighting Temeraire Tugged to her Last Berth," &c.

The picture of which we give an Engraving is that of "Spithead, with a Boat's Crew Recovering an Anchor," which was exhibited in 1809. This fine work may be accepted as a type and perpetual memento of our glorious Navy in the olden time, before the introduction of steam, as it appeared at head-quarters. The famous roadstead is seen under the influence of a fresh breeze—the water boiling and bursting in short, broken waves. Three or four men-of-war are lying snugly at anchor, whilst two others are bearing up for anchorage. Various small craft are tending the mighty monsters of the deep, one in particular being employed in the operation of recovering an anchor which has parted in the stress of weather. All is bustle and excitement—sharp work for hands and eyes—combined with such effect, and infused with such a spirit as Turner alone could give to such scenes. Looking first at the vessels under canvas, and then at those at anchor, the contrast is most remarkable: the former seem actually to sweep along, remaining the latter—in the one we hear the wind whistling through the cordage; in the other the flapping of the sails as they bring up to the wind; and then the murky sky gloaming threateningly over the angry waters, compose an engrossing scene of rage and discomfort, the only relief and contrast to which is the narrow gleam of light which falls sharply on the outworks of Portsmouth harbour, indistinctly seen in the distance. This truly poetic and masterly work is painted throughout with a firm pencil, in a fine grey tone, which fills the canvas with an invigorating air. The disposition of the broad masses of light and shade, by the introduction of the sails falling against the darker portions of the clouds, and the glimmer in the far distance, is admirably managed.

MASACCIO, PAINTED BY HIMSELF, LATELY ADDED TO THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

PORTRAIT OF MASACCIO. BY HIMSELF.

WE have great pleasure in giving an Engraving of the interesting portrait of Masaccio, painted by himself, recently purchased for the National Gallery from the Northwick Collection. Though small and unpretending in character, and not very favourably hung, this picture deserves careful study, as illustrating an important epoch in the revival of art in the fifteenth century. Tommaso Guido—nicknamed Masaccio, sapiice "Slovenly Tom," on account of his disregard of the toilet—was the most important creator in art between the period of Giotto and his followers, and that of Raphael, and his creations were so perfect, so essentially imbued with truth, that Raphael himself did not hesitate to borrow from them. Giotto had emancipated painting from the dry, lifeless, models of the Byzantine type, and drew his forms from nature; but he left much still to be done in their application. Masaccio first gave dramatic action to his figures, and an air of life and intelligence to his heads before unattempted: added to which his flesh modeling had all the texture and freshness of reality, and his colours generally were truthful and pure; or, to use the words of Vasari, "what was executed before his time might be called painting, but his pictures seem to live, they are so true and natural."

The justness of these remarks will be fully borne out by an inspection of the portrait now under consideration, which, though painted more than four hundred years ago, almost breathes upon the panel, perfect in every surface requisite, barring only a little unavoidable fading of the colours. The head itself, with its thick, unkempt hair, large observant eyes, and firmly-compressed lips, is just the one we should imagine of the young enthusiast who devoted himself unwittingly to his daring art. In lieu of costume a loose blouse, with white cotton gimp edging, and a small red cap perched on the top of the head, is all that he required for use or pictorial effect; and the whole thing looks as if it had been hit off in a brief half hour of leisure, whilst waiting for instructions from his one-time master Ghiberti, who employed him to assist him in the production of the magnificent Gates of San Giovanni at Florence, or when reflecting on the principles of perspective, which he learned from Brunelleschi, the architect.

The dates of Masaccio's birth and death are not established with certainty. Baldinucci fixing the former at 1417, and the latter at 1443, which would make him only twenty-six years old; and this is probably near the mark. Certain it is that he died young, not without suspicion of poison; and that no painter, not excepting Raphael himself, did so much in so brief a space. Amongst his more celebrated works are the frescoes in the Chapel of the Brancozzi Family, and in Church of the Carnival at Florence, and those of "The Passion of Our Saviour" in the Chapel of St. Catharine in the Church of S. Clemente at Rome. In the Carmine frescoes is one of "St. Peter Baptising," in which is a naked figure with all the appearance of shivering in the cold, which is of world-wide renown, as marking a distinct epoch in art.

BAGOZZO, OFF THE ARSENAL, VENICE.

BY E. W. COOKE, A.R.A.

MR. E. W. COOKE'S sea-pieces deservedly bear a high repute, not only for their commanding pictorial effect, in which this artist is surpassed by few, but for the unimpeachable accuracy and fulness of detail displayed in them. These eminent qualities are the result of constant observation and sketching from nature, in which the artist habitually indulges with indefatigable perseverance. In the work before us, which was exhibited in the Winter Exhibition just closed, we have a picturesque sight, teeming with interesting historical associations connected with the earliest days of the Venetian Republic. On one side is the ancient Arsenal; and in the distance, looking across the lagune, is seen the Island of Murano, with its domes and campanili, looking like another Venice; and beyond it again, in the far-off distance, we catch a glimpse of the towering chain of the Friuli Alps, ill-defined, with jagged snow-peaks soaring against the sky. It was upon this view, just as we see it, probably, that Titian looked from his garden at the Casa Grande. Mr. Cooke breaks the flat expanse of this scene by the introduction of a fishing-boat, whose quaint rigging and gaudily-painted sails form a striking object in the centre of the picture.

BAGOZZO, OFF THE ARSENAL, VENICE, MURANO IN THE DISTANCE.—BY E. W. COOKE, A.R.A.—IN THE WINTER EXHIBITION

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

Is it the reaction of our national utilitarianism which causes our only really national pageant, with its unchangeable details, to be ever now in the same of being attractive? Every one wants to see some portion of the stereotyped ceremonial of the opening of Parliament by the Queen in person. The outsiders were never more numerous than in the year of 1869; as to the insiders, the Lord Great Chamberlain alone knows what the extent of the applications for admission to the House of Peers is. It is supposed that the fatigues of refusing for two days before the day of days is the reason why Lord Willoughby D'Eresby resolutely declines the office of Lord Great Chamberlain on the first day of the Session in the Upper Chamber itself. The oldest habitués there were indulged this time with a new sensation (and it is difficult to describe how precious that sensation is) by the appearance for the first time in attendance on their Royal mother of two of the youthful Princesses who are emphatically acknowledged as the daughter of England. It is a pity that etiquette prescribed that, in order not to turn their backs on the throne, they should have been obliged to hide the light of their countenances from the major part of that sympathetic assembly amongst whom their presence shed a pleasure which kindled almost into joy.

Striking is the transition from the blaze of pageant in the House of Lords at high noon to the sober tone of business which marks the aspect of things at five, when Peers, stripped of their robes, resolve themselves into very ordinary looking men—with the notable exception of those lamplighted units, the mover and seconder of the Address, whose state uniforms render them subject to a comparison with those unhappy men in armour who used to parade on the backs of hippodrome horses in the Lord Mayor's Show. In the present case, the parallel was nearer than usual, for the neophyte orators in question delivered themselves as if they were speaking from within the close approach of many helmets with the visors down, and their efforts will only remain pleasingly through the medium of Lord Taunton, who somewhat rescued their inaudibility. It must be confessed that Lord Grey is the very type of a grievance-monger. On this occasion the leader of the Opposition, though a master of facile fluency, was scarcely to grapple with such a Queen's Speech as was the subject of debate; and, no doubt, willingly left to Lord Grey the task of making a very small hole, which it only took such efforts as the Duke of Newcastle is capable of very satisfactorily to fill up. In many persons' memories the Lord Grey of the days of Matilda, or the early English Queen, but the sentimental novel so called. If so, they will understand the delusion of Lord Derby in the Upper Chamber, which he stated to be in the possession of Lord Normanby, and which was so lectured to by Lord Granville, the political and personal change in the noble Marquis is even more marked than the natural one. Where is the liberalism and the love of freedom that went so far as to give license to the Sentence of Irish criminal Judges, and what has been the mental and moral operation which enables the same statesman to write to the Grand Dural resident of Baden-Baden Utopia, and a revived Garden of Eden in the happy territory of Romagna? The only other really noticeable features of the debate in the House of Lords, for the time being, were the Duke of Somerset's one for a brief space inaudible; that Lord Derby, as usual, speaking the same speech, with a personal application, to the same effect as Mr. Disraeli delivered to the Commons, for once was second in the race; as it was long after the lower House had risen that he spoke; and that Lord Granville, as usual, for the sake of saying what he had to good a case, suffered the penalty attendant on an ashamed of protests, and to as pointless as to be dull in the midst of an anxious struggle to be jocose.

When one was watching the appearance of the familiar faces in the House of Commons, one could not but be struck by the fact that the decidedly old men go on year after year without showing any marked physical changes. You can trace no alteration in the countenances or the persons of Mr. Spooner, Sir Henry Willoughby, and least of all in Sir Charles Burrell, who has been father of the House for a considerable number of his active years. It is in the men who were middle-aged three or four years since that one sees progress. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Cardwell, Graham was not present on this occasion, or else one might have selected him as the specimen of that transition from vigorous, upright manhood to that indigent cadaverity over which the public observer whose own youth is fading in the distance sighs. When Sir Charles Wood was President of the Board of Control, and Lord Canning's Government we remember seeing him leading two of his young sons in a day over the iron hurdles in the park. And any such diminution of the jauntiness of his stride up the floor he more assumed than real, we should be loath to allude to his capabilities for jumping now. Except in a case where a man is in the last sentence to jumping at an offer of high office, it is probable that his walking days are past over.

Really it seems as if, one after another, our traditions are slipping away. The Speaker is presumed to be the prime guardian and conservator of the privileges of the House of Commons, and yet his office piece he demands rather than prays for their continuance from the Sovereign at the meeting of every new Parliament. And the whole privilege of the Lower House has always been a democratic rush and struggle to the bar of the Upper House, as a constitutional contrast to the solemn and decorous approach of that august assembly when her Majesty literally fills the throne. How is it, then, that the Speaker should have taken to himself to be the sole representative of the people on their mode of conducting themselves in the presence and within hearing of the Queen much in the same terms as General Bombastes used when he defied his army "not to take up a pin." Was there no ancient Conservative to remonstrate against this new attack on our time-honoured customs? But, after all, Mr. Denison was too late to split his voice against the swearing-in of a member of the Jewish faith, or what can be thought of the last effort of the mighty sticklers for the cherished rust of antiquity? Then, too, was there no tear shed, if in secret, at the substitution of Colonel Clifford's title for Mr. Serjeant Dalton? Did not some Peer, fond and dark delivery of the Queen's command of the attendance of the House for Mr. Serjeant's elaborate Janis Quatorze bow and serious utterance of the Royal mandate?

But to condescend a little to details. Promise of work there was, even more than bids in the first week of Session, for since the Government, who laid down in four minutes a programme large enough for August, what is to be anticipated in which private members accumulated twenty-five notices in the ballot-box before Friday past on Tuesday? The preliminaries actually prolonged the labour of the more practical member of the Address, who sat fidgeting under the torture of losing caucus in their "livery more guarded than ordinary," until a quarter to five. It was satisfactory, therefore, to find that the sufferings of millions did not cause Mr. St. Aubyn's courage to ooze out of his fingers' ends, and that he proved himself a thorough gentlemanly, and positively made his points as if they were not impromptu efforts at all. Nearly needed Lord Granville's use of a metaphor based on the sympathy between a gallant rider and a noble horse to elicit a cheer, and he seems to be improving in the new way in heartiness in his style of speaking which smacked of the "I say fellow?" and he gave token that he means to ride as straight at Liberalism as he most probably does in the hunting-field.

In a picture of the House of Commons in 1742 which appears in this Journal a week or two since we have seen that Sir Robert Walpole, Disraeli likes to stead by the red box on the table when he is speaking. It appears from the sketch that Sir Robert Walpole was not always did so. For a few minutes after the Premier rose on this occasion he evinced an alacrity and a sprightliness which augured a short, sharp, hitting speech. But he laboured under the difficulty of having no salient points of attack against which to rush; he had first to make his glaxis before he could try to kill them; and he even failed to build up anything more capacious of blows than a dwarf or two. If the leader of an Opposition is obliged to fall back on Mr. Bonham's telegrams to found an attack upon a Government, he must be pardoned if he becomes dull, when he has resolved not to let his audience off under an hour. Indeed, he argued both sides of his own case, and was as often apologetic to, as assailant on, gentlemen opposite. Of course this left Lord Palmerston little enough to do, beyond insinuating that his opponent was aware that his assault was only a feint, and to point out, without circumlocution, that, all Mr. Disraeli's promises being baseless, the superstructure of his oration was like a house built of cards, which only wanted a breath of Ministerial candour and truth-telling (which is not half so effective to the audience or so exciting to the exhibitor as a trial of fence) to topple over and leave not "a wrack behind." In such a case there was nothing left but a practical conclusion, and the Premier's closing movement on the part of the House, and the consciousness of a good start for the Session on the part of his Government.

POLITICAL MEETINGS.

The Earl of Derby and Lord Stanley were present, with other notabilities, at a dinner given by the Speaker to the Members of Parliament for Lancashire. The dinner being of a private character, reporters were not admitted. "An outline," however, "of the proceedings has, however, been given by the main point of interest in the noble Earl's address was his allusion to the Reform Bill. Speaking generally, he expressed satisfaction at the manner in which it had been carried out, and he expressed his belief that, if the Government brought forward a measure of a sound and practical character, the House of Lords would be attempted by the Conservative party. He viewed with satisfaction the maintenance in its integrity spirit of the constitutional policy of Lord Palmerston's Administration, and alluded to the volunteer movement as one likely to prove of great importance in rendering England safe for the country." Lord Stanley, in replying to the toast of "The House of Commons," expressed his sloquiated to the advancement of knowledge, and incidentally alluded to the improved system of training which has of late been introduced into the public schools of the United Kingdom.

Sir Charles Wood, in the course of a speech at the dinner given on Saturday last, with the inauguration of the Mayor of Halifax, expressed his satisfaction upon the fact that the "last embers" of the Indian mutiny "had now been trodden out." The attempt of the Government would now, he said, be directed to the development of the wonderful resources of India; and, along with the introduction of railways, the improvement of existing at the present moment throughout our Eastern Empire, there was a prospect of making India the source of wealth, not only to herself, but to England also. Lord Stanhope, who also spoke at the banquet, expressed his belief that the "spirit of the age" was decidedly in favour of "progress in books" which now regulates admission to the Indian Civil Service.

Mr. Bright was present at the annual meeting of the Lancashire Public School Association, held in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. A resolution having been passed thanking Mr. Bright for his services in the cause of Reform, he, in reply, made numerous observations on that subject. He reiterated the statement he made at Birmingham as to his willingness to accept a measure of Reform which did not include the ballot. He also stood that in consenting to his compromise he relinquished some of his favourite principles. He thought that the question now to be viewed in the "contrast" between the "sham representation" of England and the "real representation" of France. He believed that Louis Napoleon would not accept the Presidency of the French Republic until this hour there has not been a single case in which the popular suffrage can be charged against him as an unfriendly act to the Government or people of England. Mr. Bright, in conclusion, expressed his confidence in the future of the country, and, in reference to the Queen's Speech, said that he, gentleman remarking at his Majesty's letter to M. Fould, that it was "a plain, straightforward speech."

The Hon. W. P. Campbell, M.P., addressed a meeting of his constituents on Saturday last at the Corn Exchange, Bolton-le-Moors, and, in the course of his gentleman's address, which was almost exclusively devoted to foreign affairs, a very high compliment to the conduct of the Emperor Napoleon was carried unanimously.—Mr. Campbell has addressed a letter to the Provost of Oxford, declining to become a candidate for the Lord Rectorship. His plan is "that the power of determining by which method an election should be conducted, that is to say, the first question to be decided, and upon which sends members, and in which town councillors are chosen by the ballot-box, should be left to the constituencies themselves, and that no Parliamentary election security or openly would come in the same way as any other election, by open voting."

An address on Reform was delivered a few days ago before the members of the Reform Association, established by Mr. Bright, in Birmingham. There was a very large attendance, and the proceedings were of a very enthusiastic nature. Mr. Bright, in addressing the meeting, "was received with a lengthy address, in the course of which he said:—"Should the Reform Bill of Lord John Russell, which was rejected by the House, in terms of his duty, the constituencies would be enlarged, and the brother and oppressor Council and Reform Bill would be carried through. Then, and then only, I will complain. If it were possible that the ballot should be passed antecedent to the Reform Bill, I should be willing to vote for it, but I am sure that it is really the minds of the electors that now are on the subject, I would say that the ballot would be carried. After advocating the principles of Gloucester by a compromise between parties, little reason given for it and less against it, I should not hesitate to vote for it, and had rather see it carried than that the glorious Hampden claimed representation for him who paid the tax. I should also prefer to see the Reform Bill carried than that the opportunity of Reform Bill that does not do them justice."

Mr. Chas. Reed, M.P., and Mr. Ernest Jones, the members for the town of Nottingham, were entertained at a public dinner in the Exchange Hall Market, on the 14th inst., by their constituents. Mr. Reed, in the course of the proceedings, congratulated the meeting on the fact that Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell were no longer in office. The latter nobleman, he said, "had made peaceful agitation impossible, and the Premier had taken away the power of the people." Mr. Ernest Jones, who was received with great enthusiasm, sketched out the leading provisions of a bill for the prevention of bribery which he proposed to introduce into the House of Commons. He was opposed into Parliament at the earliest opportunity. He mentioned that he had already had the honour of addressing the Liberal Associations of Gloucester and Wakefield election committees, and that they had given them their approval.

At the Reading Farmers' Club annual dinner on Saturday Mr. J. Walter, M.P., the Hon. F. F. Bouverie, M.P., and Captain Vernon, M.P., the county members—were present, and in their speeches alluded to the topics of the day. Mr. Walter said he was rather satisfied with the volunteer movement, and gave as a toast "The Army and Navy." Captain Vernon returned thanks, and said he was glad to find that the Government of Gloucester in abundance of her resources. The Hon. F. F. Bouverie, in a speech of some length, expressed his belief that the Liberal party would Reform Bill and to oppose the ballot. Mr. Walter, speaking on the same subject, said he hoped a measure would be introduced which would be just and equitable to settle the question, and until this was done they could not anticipate to any satisfaction to the public. With respect to the ballot he was entirely in accord with his hon. colleague.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

SIR HENRY MAINWARING.

Sir Henry Mainwaring Mainwaring, Bart., of Over Peover, Cheshire, who died suddenly on the 11th inst., was the eldest son of Thomas Mainwaring, Esq., who assumed the surname and arms of Mainwaring on succeeding to the estate of his half-brother, Sir Henry Mainwaring, fourth and last Baronet of a former creation. Henry Mainwaring Mainwaring, the subject of this notice, was born on the 25th of April, 1792, and was created a Baronet on the 26th of May, 1838. Sir Henry was highly and justly popular as an English country gentleman, a free spender of his income and was honoured and appreciated in Cheshire some years ago.

He was a fine specimen of the old-fashioned English gentleman, of the first-rate style, and he was always a leading man in the county, and a prominent figure in society. Sir Henry, for a long time past, had been residing in a quiet manner, at Over Peover, in the village of which name, where he and his family also endeared themselves to the inhabitants. He had a considerable estate in Cheshire, and also in Staffordshire, and that he bore the appellation of "the good old Sir Harry" Sir Henry married, first, in 1815, Sophia, youngest daughter and co-heir of Sir Robert Salusbury Cotton, Bart., and sister of the gallant Lord Combermere, by whom she died in May, 1851. By her he had seven sons, of whom two survive him, and six daughters, of whom five survive him, viz., Sophia, married to the Rev. Sidney Pole Thornhill, of Stanton Lyton, of Leeswood, Flintshire; Mrs. Henry Dalbiac; and Mrs. Yorke, of Marbury. Sir Henry married, secondly, in 1852, Mrs. Jane Henry Mainwaring, the second Baronet, who was born the 6rd of November, 1792, and died in December, 1853. Lady Emma, eldest daughter of John Thomas William Patten, Esq., of Wittenshaw, Cheshire, and has four sons and four daughters.

THE RIGHT HON. MATTHEW TALBOT BAINES.

The Right Hon. Matthew Talbot Baines, P.C., late M.P. for Leeds, was the eldest son of Edward Baines, Esq., M.P. for Leeds, by his wife, who was daughter of Matthew Talbot, Esq., of Dublin. He was born at Leeds on 2nd of February, 1799, and was educated at Richmond School, Yorkshire, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as 24th Wrangler and 2nd Chancellor's Medallist in 1821, and was elected a Fellow of his College. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in Hilary Term, 1826, and joined the Northern Circuit, where he obtained a very fair practice. He became a Queen's Counsel and Bencher of Lincoln's Inn in 1841. He was elected for Leeds in Hull from 1837 to 1847. Mr. Baines, who was a Liberal in politics, first sat for Hull, from 1837 to 1841, and afterwards from 1857 for Leeds. He was appointed President of the Poor-law Board and made a Privy Councillor in 1847, and continued to hold that office for a few months from 1855 to 1858. Mr. Baines was a statesman and politician of much sagacity and ability, and was universally respected for his high character and impartiality. He spoke at the Bar and in Parliament fluently and sensibly. He was a man of high moral principles, and of considerable knowledge of the common sense of honour; and was very generally loved and respected. Mr. Baines, who was in his seventy-first year, was likely to live for many years, but disease, suffered much latterly from ill-health, and had in consequence retired from Parliament and ceased to practise at the Bar. On the death of his son-in-law, house, 12, Queen-square, Westminster. Mr. Baines married, in 1833, Anne, daughter of J. Tuckfield.

LIEUT.-GENERAL FALCONAR.

Lieut.-General Chesborough Grant Falconar, K.H., who died a few days ago at Bath, entered the Bengal Artillery and in upwards of sixty years of active service in that Army, having entered the service in September, 1795. He joined the 0181 Regiment in the Deccan in 1804, and was present at the siege of Bhurtpore in 1805. He joined the 0181 Regiment in the Deccan in 1804, and was present at the siege of Bhurtpore in Egypt, and joined General Sir David Baird's army at Cossier, crossing the Desert to Kenneh, where he came up with the army of Egypt in the year 1803. In 1804 and 1805 he was in the campaign in Italy under General Sir John Stuart, and in 1806 and 1807 in Sicily, where he commanded a horse shot under him when acting as Aide-de-Camp to General Sir John Oswald at the Battle of Scylla, and at the siege and capture of Catrone, &c. Falconar again repaired to Egypt in 1807; and during that campaign was present at the British landing at Aboukir and the battle of Alexandria, the first affair at Lake Etche and Rhamnet, the investment and capture of Rosetta, the passage of the Nile, and Rhamnet, the investment and campaigns of 1814 and 1815 in Holland and Flanders. He commanded the Light Infantry Corps of Artillery at the battle of Quatre Bras, the retreat to Brussel, and the bombardment of Antwerp. For some years Falconar was the lieutenant-colonel commanding the Royal Regiment of Artillery and Recruiting Field Officer of the Recruiting Staff. In 1837 he was nominated a Knight of the Royal Guelphic Order. On the death of General Macpherson, in 1857, he was made Colonel of the 78rd Foot. He became a Lieutenant-General the 9th of July, 1858.

CAPTAIN SPOOR.

Nicholas Appleby Spoor, Esq., a magistrate in the county of Durham, and Warkworth, Northumberland, Captain 32th Regiment (King's Own Borderers), a Deputy Lieutenant of Northumberland, and late Lieutenant in the Durham Militia, was born on the 6th of November, 1806. He was one of the late Nicholas Spoor, Esq., of Whitburn, near Sunderland, and Warkworth, an active magistrate for the county of Durham, whom he succeeded in December, 1851. He entered the British Army on the 7th of April, 1848, and embarked immediately for the Cape of Good Hope. He became a Lieutenant in the 45th of 12th of December, 1849, and Captain in the Recruiting Field Officer of the Recruiting Staff. In 1837 he was nominated a Knight of the Royal Guelphic Order. On the death of General Macpherson, in 1857, he was made Colonel of the 78rd Foot. He became a Lieutenant-General the 9th of July, 1858.

Sir William Charles Rose, R.A., died at his residence, 33, Fitzroy-square, yesterday week.

Frightful Pit Accident.—Last Saturday morning a frightful accident took place at No. 15 pit of the New Cross Colliery, Wednesfield Heath, near Wolverhampton, the property of Mr. R. H. Whitehouse, of Bergley, in which seven persons, four men and three boys, lost their lives. On Saturday morning the night engineer had just been relieved, and the first lot or "banks" of miners were being lowered, the cage containing four men and three boys. They descended the first ten or twelve yards safely, when the drum suddenly went out of gearing, and the cage, thus freed from all check of the machinery, fell to the bottom of the "sump," or well in which the drainage of the shaft is collected, breaking through the stout planking which forms the fencing of the sump. An alarm was raised, and the miners were collected from all parts of the works; but it was fully four hours before the bodies could be recovered, on account of the difficulty that was experienced in raising the cage and the wire rope to which it was attached. All the bodies were found in the sump, in which there was a considerable depth of water.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE PROPERTIES OF NICKEL.—Some new facts were recently laid before the Academy of Sciences on this subject by M. Tissier, who contends that, as regards resistance to the action of acids (with the exception of nitric acid), nickel is superior to iron, zinc, copper, lead, and tin; and that in tenacity it is also superior to iron (in the proportion of 50 to 70). M. Melsens stated that in the smelter company of Amerena nickel has been already employed. The applications of this metal in the arts will doubtless increase.

ELECTRICITY.—In the last number of the Annales de Chemie will be found papers on this subject by the eminent Italian philosophers Matteucci, of Pisa, and Volpicelli, of Rome. The former in one paper remarks upon the electric phenomena manifested in the telegraph wires of Tuscany and the appearance of the aurora borealis of the winter of 1858-9; in another paper he treats of the electric properties of the insulating bodies. M. Volpicelli's communications are of a mathematical character.

NEW CHRONOTYPE.—A mechanical contrivance has been invented by Mr. Marshall, architect, of Guildford, which is described by Horne and Thornthwaite, opticians, London, for exhibiting coloured patterns by means of rotating coloured sectors, and which they call the Chromatrope, or perforated pattern cut in black paper. The revolution of the disc beneath the sectors causes the most elaborate combinations, and the most symmetrical and other devices, fruit, flowers, patterns for dresses, &c., may be seen by this simple process, which promises to be not only an elegant appendage to the drawing-room, but of considerable importance in the fabric-pattern manufacturing world, at the same time eliminating many valuable facts in optical science.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL ON LIGHT.—Royal Institution, Jan. 19. The second lecture was commenced with (1) an examination of the colours of the solar spectrum into seven colours—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet. It was then demonstrated (2) that these colours have different powers of refraction and dispersion; (3) that the smaller the aperture the purer will be the spectrum; (4) that the colours of a pure spectrum cannot be further decomposed (blue will always be blue, red be red, &c.); (5) that the colours of nature bodies are not inherent, but are coloured by the light which falls upon them; (6) that, when the colours of the spectrum are mixed they produce white; (7) that any two colours whose mixture produces white are complementary colours. The truth of this proposition was manifested in a most astonishing manner by a series of experiments, mostly by the agency of the electric light. We subjoin the following memoranda:—Velocity of light in a second, 192,500 miles; in water, 144,000 miles; in glass, 126,000 miles; in a diamond, 77,000 miles. Velocity of sound in a second, 1142 feet; in water, 4800 feet; in glass, 10,920 feet.

PROFESSOR OWEN'S LECTURES ON FOSSIL REPTILES, AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.—The third lecture of this interesting course, delivered on Tuesday last, was devoted to the consideration of the reptiles of the chalk and the genera of each of the orders into which that class is divided. Reptiles are cold-blooded, vertebrate animals, with a heart and respiratory system, which enable them to pass their lives in the water or on the land. The order Batrachia includes frogs, toads, and reptiles having naked skins, which in the adult state of their existence acquire the power of air breathing. Indeed, all the classes, as it were, slide into each other. The proteus, or "eel with two pairs of legs," is a case in point, for while it has five slit mouths in the mud as a reptile and six months in the water as a fish, having both lungs and gills. Among the batrachians are numbers of the huge water salamander of Japan, one of which is now living at Amsterdam, who has manifested his powers by the production of his female companion. 2. The order Ophidia includes all the serpent tribe, among which the most especially noted are the non-poisonous boa and python worm and the complex structure of the boa constrictor, particularly describing the boa's mouth made of flexible bones, which is designed with admirable disposition of the movable bones of the mouth. 3. The order Lacertian includes the beautiful chameleon, as to the power of sight of the chameleon, &c. The varying colour of the chameleon, the Professor stated, is caused by the power of varying the position of the pigment cells, the pigment which are deposited in the layers of the skin. The monitor lizard was also noticed, which derives its name from the supposed power of warning the sleeping traveller of the approach of danger by crawling over his face. 4. The order Chelonia includes tortoises, turtles, the sea turtle of the seas, and fresh-water turtles. 5. The order Crocodilia includes the fish crocodile, the crocodile of Egypt, and the alligator. The peculiar distinguishing structure of all these orders was described in a terse, felicitous manner, the Professor not being content with merely stating a fact. Herodotus's account of the sandbird as the friendly companion of the crocodile (because it has cleaned the fetches fastened between the teeth), and also giving alarm on the approach of danger, was most happily told. The crocodile, nothing daunted by Mr. Bullock's cleaning apparatus, drawings of the various reptiles commented on, to which Professor Owen referred with great discrimination.

ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM.—Professor Tyndall, at the Royal Institution, during the past week, delivered evening meetings with a discourse "On the Influence of the Magnetic Force on Electricity in Motion," in illustration of Mr. Faraday's views on the above. The matter of the discourse, derived from the researches of Professor Tyndall, Dr. Hughes, and Ryles, was illustrated by a series of brilliant and instructive experiments, including the use of the electric discharge from the induction coil, and of the magnetic force upon it. We merely indicate a few of the magnificent illustrations. The influence of a magnet upon a large magnet upon the carbon terminals of a voltaic battery of forty cells was shown, and the motion of a magnetic needle in splendid cream of green light between the introduction of a silver button between the terminals of the battery. A small horseshoe magnet of 1 ½ gramme brought near the terminals of a bench luther and tinther, and, in some cases, a magnificent green bow was formed. Illustrations of the magnetism of the voltaic arc were given by Mr. Davy. The transport of matter by the voltaic current was further illustrated by a series of beautiful experiments by Mr. J. Hughes, including the continued discharge of an induction-coil. A discharge from Rohmkorff's coil was sent through an attenuated medium; the glow was immediately under the negative electrode was referred by, and the very remarkable action of the magnet upon the positive light was shown, and the whole discourse was beautifully exhibited on a screen. The rotation of an electric current round the pole of a magnet was explained by Professor Faraday, and was closely followed by the exhibition of the rotation of a luminous current from an Rhumkorff coil in an exhausted receiver. The rotation of a magnetic force in augmenting the loudness and brightness of the electric discharge, by suddenly interrupting the primary spark, and thus causing the whole of the entire force of the extra current into a moment of time, was displayed in a very remarkable manner. The passage of electricity through the helix of Rohmkorff's coil were next shown. Mr. Gassiot, with a water battery of 3000 cells, was made to urge a voltaic spark across a space of one inch before bringing the electrodes into contact. On the present occasion a large horseshoe magnet was placed between the poles of the same powerful magnet. Brilliant streaked discharges passed when the ends of the battery were connected with the electrodes of the receiver. On restricting the magnet, between whose poles the receiver was placed, the steady light within it curved itself, and, according to the polarity of the magnet, in a general direction to a series of elliptic transverse bars of light, which appeared to travel from the pole to the surface of the jar. The force of the electric current was finally extinguished by the action of the magnet. The powerful forces which exist in the coils, and the magnetic influence which could be employed for this purpose, were kindly lent by Mr. Gassiot, so eminent for his researches in the department of science. The illustrations afforded by any idea of the enormous amount of thought and labour expended by Dr. Tyndall in the preparation of his lectures, and the success of the various experiments, details of which will be shortly printed by the institution, and doubtless inserted in the scientific journals.

LOSS OF ANOTHER AUSTRALIAN SHIP.—The ship John Sayers, Captain J. Mitchell, left the Thames about the same time as the ill-fated Marie Cecile, and for the same port (Adelaide), was totally lost on the 6th inst. in lat. 36° 39' S., long. 17° 11' E. She had a general cargo, and on the 21st of December she encountered a succession of fearful gales. In the first gale a heavy sea struck her and carried away her main chip forward. On the 6th the look increased so much that it was determined to scud before the wind, and the foresail had not been long set when, after dreadful privations and buffeting about, the captain, his wife, and crew were picked up, although in separate boats, by the barque Lady Jocelyn, Captain Dake, from Carthagena to Newport, where they were landed. The Lady Jocelyn was all right on Sunday last, according to Mr. Wilson, of Liverpool, who, by Lloyd's list, appears to have lost within six months of his own.

CAUTION TO EMIGRANTS TO PERU.—The Government Emigration Board has received the following notice:—Her Majesty's Emigration Commissioners have been requested to caution the public against the schemes for the conveyance of emigrants from Ireland to Peru, which had received the sanction of the Peruvian Government. These schemes provide for a free grant of uncultivated land, at an elevation of 6000 feet above the level of the sea, together with a free passage, which is stated to be obtained for £5. That nothing is said as to the locality of the proposed settlement, which may be in the wild districts on the east side of the Andes; nor to say provision made for conveying the emigrants to their lands, nor for their maintenance until they are in a position to maintain themselves. But even if the emigrants were settled in a civilised part of the country they would probably be subjected to great privations, especially as the settlers entertain a feeling of suspicion and dislike towards strangers; but, if settled in the wild districts on the east side of the Andes, they would have no means of providing themselves with the supplies necessary for their existence in the world, consequently, be exposed to the risk of famine, and of falling a prey to savages. Under these circumstances the public should be especially careful not to be led away by the alleged advantages offered by the proposed scheme."

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AN ADMIRER OF THE CHESS PROBLEMS IN MR. STAUNTON'S new work, "Chess Praxis," the suppression in his "Handbook" is just published, may be glad of the publisher.

PHILOMUSUS.—The arrangements of the secretary of the London Chess Club, which we noticed in our last, are, we have been informed, as follows:—It is a one-game handicap tournament, restricted to the members of the club, and to commence on the 1st of February, with as few capricious numbers play. Every player to play with every other player. The winner of the first prize to be entitled to play a match with the winner of the second prize, and the next greatest number of games to hold the second prize. Fifteen players have entered, divided to the sections. Section No. 1 playing on even terms: Mongredien, Healey, Dresden, Löwenthal, Kling, Pierce. No. 2, 1 v. Schroder, Cafler, Forbes. No. 3, 2 v. Delaneld, Hartis, Wellborg. No. 4 Burne. No. 1 to give P and two moves to No. 2, Knight to move first. No. 2 to give P and move to No. 3, Pawn and two moves.

R. T., Shrewsbury, and Others.—We refer you to remedy the five in his "Eclectic Solitary" by placing the Rook Queen's on K B 4th. We will not the omission of the White Pawn in Q R 2nd here the same effect.

J. S. B.—Your solution is correct, to the satisfaction of the examiners.

ANON, Leeds.—Next week, if possible, but this week has created a great deal of consideration.

THE FARM.

The variations of the weather from damp to hard frost has increased the unfavourable reports as respects the new wheat, which, in consequence of its weakness, has been more than usually subject to the attacks of birds—larks and starlings in particular. The state of the ground has in many places quite put a stop to out-door labour; and nearly all the English wheat came in wretched condition to Mark-lane on Monday, and consequently sold at a trifling decline.

Mr. Thorley, the principal vendor of "Thorley's cattle food," has published a new pamphlet to "show beyond doubt that "the Rothamsted experiment was a complete failure." The chemical friends of Messrs. Lawes and Morton bore very heavily on the above expensive mode of feeding with mixtures which cost from £12 to £16 a ton; and a very elaborate table has been given of "the estimated money-value of manure from one ton of each food, supposing it to be good of its kind." It enumerates twenty-five varieties, from linseed-cake, cotton seed cake, £9 10s., down to common turnips and carrots, 4s. Manure produced from a ton of linseed-cake is valued by Mr. Mechi, cake, at £4 12s.; malt dust, £4 8s.; tares, £3 13s. 6d.; meadow hay, £3 10s.; wheat, £3 3s. 6d.; oats, £2 19s. 6d.; and swedes, 4s. 6d.

The Highland Agricultural Society held their last quarterly meeting last Wednesday week, at which three hundred members attended and elected just half as many new ones. Gold medals were awarded to Messrs. Duncan, Fulton, Porter, and Skirving for their reports on the agriculture of the Lothians, and cultivation of Italian rye-grass, top-dressing pasture, and cultivation of wheat-land, respectively; and the medium gold medal to Mr. Sheriff for a report on the new variety of wheat. The next show will be held at Dundee this year, Perth next year, and, probably, at Kelso in 1862. In future, the 1st of February instead of the 1st of October, is to be the period assumed for determining age, and the judges are to be chosen by members, and not by popular election. The principal exhibitors of the animals mentioned at the agricultural dinner of Mr. Todd's Volga, which was third to Matchless IV. and Rosette at Warwick, and to Mr. Stewart's Bessie, at Shrewsbury, and second at Edinburgh to Venus de Medicis, in the cow classes. Hence, at the end of the year, Mr. Stewart's animal has quite a noted prize cow in decidedly vulgar-looking. It seems that she was bred by Mr. Stewart, of Southwick, who sold her as a bobtailed beast; and, although she is now eight off, she has never been in calf. Consequently she loses her tail every year, and is highly commended. Mr. Rudd's Favourite, taken her Warwick one, if eligible; but the sister kingdom, the prize is saved to the society. It seems that Volga has been frequently observed to be a most kind mother, but at Warwick she was to be seen with a calf by her side. Mr. Todd alleges that he never intended to breed from her, and that to have been put to her to retain milk he found upon her; but it is urged on the other side that no milk could be drawn that seeing a calf there was quite calculated to throw the judges off their guard and counteract the impression which the sternan look of the animal might have had on their minds. We should say that the decision was correct in the case of the two-year old heifer which separated Fidelity and Pearl, was glaringly, and, even if she had not been informed on the ground that the calf was not her own, we should have held the same opinion. As it was, the little black-nose was a prominent object at all three shows, and, with a great deal of unpleasantness, has since thereby.

The Towneley Calf Gazette for 1859 contains seven heifer and fifteen bull calves, five of them by Frederick, six by Royal Butterfly, six by Baron Aspewell, three by Butterfly's Nephew, and two by Master Butterfly. One of the Baron Aspewell bull calves died soon after its birth, and another by Baron Hopewell was slaughtered. The twins produced were by Frederick and Romulus and Butterfly," and we have Royal Butterfly's first, Royal Butterfly's Jemima, Young Butterfly, White Butterfly, &c., from Decorum, Emma, Young Barmaid, Rose, Lady Butterfly, Lady Aspewell, and, even sister to Duchess 77th, has had a dark roan heifer Archduke heifer calf, her second by Frederick, and named Duchess 82nd. Captain Spencer has just sold his yearling heifer Sontag for a good, one price to Mr. Duke of Aylesbury, and Mr. Douglas, after keeping him three seasons, has announced a sale of his Lancaster Lass Rose for sale or hire, along with Omega of the Gwynne blood, and three other juvenile knights, by Frederick, Lord Geoffrey, and Rose, as well as some heifers. Sir James the Rose goes back to Mr. John Booth's famous Killerby herd, and has lowest selling price is 400 guineas. He is the sire of the Maid of Athelstane, the mother to the renowned Rose of Athelstane, who (as her dam, Rose of Summer, had done in her time) was the talk of auctioneers in high prices at a slean sweep in 1857. Of Dovers and Hereford we have no news since last month, but information is requested by Mr. Duckham from the breeders of the latter, with a view to revising and reprinting the first two volumes of his "Herd Book."

A collection of 657 base shillings, each coin being wrapped in a piece of thin paper, after the approved manner of the "smashing" fraternity, was announced to be sold by auction by the Metropolitan Board of Carlisle. NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS HOLDING COUNCIL ON THE FATE OF A WHITE PRISONER—FROM A PICTURE BY W. T. RANNEY, N. A., IN THE ART-UNION OF NEW YORK.

NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

THE "red man" is fast disappearing from the continent over which his fathers once held undisputed sovereignty, and will, in all probability, in less than a century become as wholly a thing of history as the aboriginal Briton that opposed the landing of Julius Cæsar, or the savage Pict that fled across the Grampians and defied the Roman legions to follow him. In all the wide dominions of the United States, the Canadas, and the Hudson's Bay Company, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there are not as many red men left as would people the borough of Marylebone;—not above half as many souls as are congregated together in the Quaker city of Philadelphia. War, whisky, smallpox, and the constant encroachments of the white race upon their hunting-grounds have so thinned their numbers that out of the millions that once roamed through the mighty wildernesses of the West no more than 315,000 remain—a yearly-diminishing host, dispirited, demoralised, and dying out. So broken are they in courage and in fortune that scarcely one man of pure Indian blood has arisen within the last fifty years to do battle with the whites in defence of the rights of the aborigines—their greatest warriors, such as Mackintosh, Red Eagle, Oceola, and Billy Bowlegs being half breeds—the sons of Indian women by English, Scotch, Welsh, Irish, and French fathers. Billy Bowlegs himself, the great chief of the Seminoles, who so gallantly defied the whole power of the United States for upwards of a dozen years in the all but inaccessible swamps of Florida, recently yielded himself a prisoner of war, and left no successor to his heroism. In the New England States—Yankeeland proper—not a single Indian remains, unless it be some semicivilised "medicine-man" who keeps a shop for the sale of herbs and simples, and pretends to cure diseases by Indian remedies. In the far-off wilds of the large State of New York, on the borders of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and the banks of the St. Lawrence a few are still to be found; but if they were all mustered and marched in procession up Broadway they would not form a very imposing multitude. 280 Tuscaroras, 450 of the tribe of St. Regis, 470 Onondaiguas, 250 Oneidas, and 143 Cayugas—in all 1592 men, women, and children—dwell in scattered villages in the highlands and on the shores of the Lakes, attempting, but with little success, to cultivate the soil, and loving hunting and fishing far better than farming or any kind of handicraft, except the making of mocassins, feather-fans, and ornaments of bark and beads, in which the women excel. Pennsylvania, bought by William Penn of the Delawares, knows the Delawares no more; the last remnants of the tribe, amounting at the present time to no more than 902 souls, having long across travelled westward, with the setting sun, to the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. Maryland and Kentucky are as free of the aboriginal tribes as New England itself; and Ohio and Indiana, where forty years ago men still alive and hale had to defend their scalps from the tomahawks of agile and treacherous savages that burst upon them in the dead of the night, on places where flourishing cities now stand, are as rarely visited by a real red Indian as the Strand or Fleet-street. New Mexico, Texas, California, Arkansas, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Oregon, Utah, and Washington territory are the States where they are to be found in the greatest numbers; and the five last named contain many powerful and ferocious tribes that civilisation has as yet touched with nothing better or more humanising than rum and whisky, unless it be the musket and the rifle, in the use of which they have long been proficient. Among the most numerous of the tribes that still roam amid the rich lands or the swamps and pine barrens of the South or in the wide wild prairies of the West are the Cherokees and Choctaws of Arkansas, the former tribe comprising upwards of 17,000 souls and the latter upwards of 16,000. In the same State are reckoned about 25,000 of the once great nation of the Creeks. In Texas there are about 20,000 of the Comanches, and in California about 35 000 of various tribes. In Kansas and Nebraska are to be found the Pawnees and the Poncas—hostile nations—the former amounting to about 4000 and the latter to scarcely 1000 souls. The Sioux, still a powerful nation, are scattered over Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the wild regions of the Upper Missouri, the Platte and the Arkansas Rivers, and number, according to the census taken by the United States' Government in the year 1857, 27,423 souls. The Indians of the prairies and the plains are the least changed in their habits and characteristics from the Indians of two centuries ago, with whom the Anglo-Saxon immigrants waged so long and fierce a conflict for the possession of the soil; but, as already stated, they are fast disappearing. The buffalo, which they hunt and upon which they depend principally for their subsistence, is fast disappearing also; and the prediction has been made, both by travellers and agents of the United States' Government, who ought to know what they speak about, that the red man and the buffalo will in these regions become extinct together; or that, at all events, the Indian will not long survive the animal on which he preys, and on which he makes such exterminating warfare.

The scene represented in our Engraving, from a picture by Mr. Felix O. C. Darley, of New York, one of the greatest and most original artists that America has produced, represents an incident that is not of unfrequent occurrence, either in Nebraska or in Utah—a council of Indians deciding the fate of a white prisoner, whom they have bound to a tree, preparatory to his torture and incremation. Such a council of war seldom or never terminates in mercy. "Revenge and death" is the verdict of the judges and the executioners, for they are both in one; a verdict often expressed in terse, oracular, and metaphorical phrase by the oldest chief of the party:—

> I heard a voice on the winter blast,
> Brothers, a voice of woe!
> And it cried for vengeance, as it passed
> O'er the cold, blood crimson snow.
> The wind hath sunk over dell and hill,
> But the voice, the voice, I hear it still!

Every reader of the novels of Fenimore Cooper, and of the poems of Longfellow, as well as of the more truthful pages of such writers as Catlin, knows the bright side of the red man's character, his tearless stoicism, his reckless daring, his natural dignity, and his untutored sagacity. Over these and countless other romantic traits of his savage life bright eyes have often shed delicious tears, and fond hearts have fluttered with sympathetic emotion, though such eyes and hearts would doubtless have revolted at any very close or actual association with the interesting savages. But the Indian medal, like every other, has two sides; and it is not to be denied that, take him for all in all, the red man is an uncivilisable barbarian, and that his original virtues of truthfulness and sobriety, always counterbalanced by cruelty and cunning, are fast disappearing, and are giving place to the vilest treachery, the most humiliating intemperance, and the most savage ferocity. The latest book on the subject, "The Prairie Traveller," a handbook for overland expeditions and the principal routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific, by Randolph B. Marcy, Captain in the United States' Army, and published by authority of the War Department of the United States, narrates the following incident, which might have served Mr. Darley for the subject of his excellent picture, and which will serve to show that the "noble savage" is not so noble as romancers and rhymers have pleased themselves and their readers by depicting him:—

> While en route from New Mexico to Arkansas, in 1849, I was encamped near the head of the Colorado River; and, wishing to know the character of the country for a few miles in advance of our position, I desired an officer to go out and make the reconnaissance. I was lying sick in my bed at the time or I should have performed the duty myself. I expected the officer would have taken an escort with him, but he omitted to do so, and started off alone. After proceeding a short distance he discovered four mounted Indians coming at full speed directly towards him, when, instead of turning his own horse toward the camp, and endeavouring to make his escape (he was well mounted), or halting and assuming a defensive attitude, he deliberately rode up to them; after which the tracks indicated that they proceeded about three miles together, when the Indians most brutally killed and scalped my most unfortunate but too credulous friend, who might probably have saved his life had he not, in the kindness of his excellent heart, imagined that the savages would reciprocate his friendly advances. He was most wofully mistaken, and his life paid the forfeit of his generous and noble disposition.
> I have never been able to get any positive information as to the persons who committed this murder, yet circumstances render it highly probable that they were a party of young Indians who were returning from an unsuccessful foray, and they were unable to resist the temptation of taking the scalp and horse of the Lieutenant.

Captain Marcy, though he has the highest respect for the sagacity of the Indian tribes, and the wonderful observation of the phenomena of nature—of which he relates many striking incidents that occurred within his own experience—has none to bestow upon their general character. He shares the universal feeling of the white men of the borders, who look upon the Indians as they do upon the wolves and bears, and shoot them down with as little compunction. The Captain gives the following advice to travellers—whether they be immigrant Mormons or English sportsmen—who traverse the prairies as to the behaviour incumbent on them on meeting Indians. He says:—

> On approaching strangers these people put their horses at full speed, and persons not familiar with their peculiarities and habits might interpret this as an act of hostility; but it is their custom with friends as well as enemies, and should not occasion groundless alarm. When a party is discovered approaching thus, and are near enough to distinguish signals, all that is necessary in order to ascertain their disposition is to raise the right hand with the palm in front, and gradually to push it forward and backward several times. They all understand this to be a command to halt, and, if they are not hostile, it will at once be obeyed. After they have stopped the right hand is raised again as before, and slowly moved to the right and left, which signifies "I do not know you. Who are you?" As all the wild tribes have their peculiar pantomimic signals by which they are known, they answer the inquiry by giving their signal. If this should not be understood, they may be asked if they are friends by raising both hands grasped in the manner of shaking hands, or by locking the two forefingers firmly, while the hands are held up. If friendly they will respond with the same signal; but if enemies they will probably disregard the command to halt, or give the signal of anger, by closing the hand, placing it against the forehead, and turning it back and forth while in that position.
> The pantomimic vocabulary is understood by all the prairie Indians, and, when oral communication is impracticable, it constitutes the court or general council language of the plains. The signs are exceedingly graceful and significant; and, what was a fact of much astonishment to me, I discovered they were very nearly the same as those practised by the mutes in our deaf and dumb schools, and were comprehended by them with perfect facility. The Comanche is represented by making with the hand a waving motion in imitation of the crawling of a snake; the Cheyenne, or Cut-arm, by drawing the hand across the arm, to imitate cutting it with a knife; the Arapahoes, or Smellers, by seizing the nose with the thumb and forefinger; the Sioux, or Cut-throats, by drawing the hand across the throat; the Pawnees, or Wolves, by placing a hand on each side of the forehead, with two fingers pointing to the front, to represent the narrow, sharp ears of the wolf; the Crows by imitating the flapping of the bird's wings with the palms of the hands. When Indians meet a party of strangers, and are disposed to be friendly, the chiefs, after the usual salutations have been exchanged, generally ride out and accompany the commander of the party some distance, holding a friendly talk, and at the same time indulging their curiosity by learning the news, &c. Phlegmatic and indifferent as they appear to be, they are very inquisitive and observing, and at the same time exceedingly circumspect and cautious about disclosing their own purposes. They are always desirous of procuring, from whomsoever they meet, testimonials of their good behaviour, which they preserve with great care, and exhibit upon all occasions to strangers, as a guarantee of future good conduct. On meeting with a chief of the Southern Comanches in 1849, after going through the usual ceremony of embracing and assuring me that he was the best friend the Americans ever had among the Indians, he exhibited certificates from the different white men he had met with testifying to his friendly disposition. Among these was one that he desired me to read with special attention, as he said he was of the opinion that perhaps it might not be so complimentary in its character as some of the others. It was in these words:—
> "The bearer of this says he is a Comanche chief, named Senaco; that he is the biggest Indian and best friend the whites ever had; in fact, that he is a first-rate fellow, but I believe he is a d——d rascal; so look out for him."
> I smiled on reading the paper, and, looking up, found the chief's eyes intently fixed upon mine with an expression of the most earnest inquiry. I told him the paper was not as good as it might be, whereupon he destroyed it.

THE PEAK CAVERN, DERBYSHIRE.

PERSONS whose knowledge of Derbyshire is confined to such beautiful spots as Dovedale, Chatsworth, and Matlock would scarcely believe in the wildness and desolateness of the upper part of the county. Here scarcely a tree is to be seen, stone walls are in the place of hedges, and miles of barren hills, without even a bush upon them, stretch away into the distance until, melting into a soft grey tint, they are lost altogether or are mistaken for cloud ridges. Every now and then the traveller meets with mounds of earth thrown up, surmounted by ruins of machinery standing out like wrecks against the sky. These mounds show where mines have been commenced, found unprofitable, and abandoned. The liveliness of the scene is not increased by the mournful and troubled wail of the pewit as it strives to lead you by its cries away from its nest.

The hill upon which stands Peak Castle, the stronghold of the Peverils, is about midway between the barren and the luxuriant. On the one side are nothing but bleak hills, on the other glimpses are caught of wood and dale, which increase in beauty every mile you proceed. To the left is "Mam Tor," the shivering mountain. It is composed of alternate layers of shell and grit. The action of the weather loosens the shell, and the slightest wind brings it down with a noise resembling shivering. You may also see the "Winnats" or Wind Gates, a valley running between high rocks; and, directly beneath you, at the bottom of a ravine 300 feet deep, is the mouth of the famous Devil's Cave. It is approached by a winding path, and it is only at the last turn that you see the gigantic opening, black and frowning, with a perspective of grotesque piles running into it. The effect is most startling—solemn and weird as a subterranean cemetery. The entrance is 40 feet high, 100 in width, and 300 in depth. The height of the entrance cave gradually decreases from forty to about six feet. You then enter a passage so low as to oblige you to stoop. Passing the "Bell House" (a large dome in the solid rock), you traverse a second passage, which leads to a large chamber about 200 feet wide and 120 high. Bengal fire is lighted here, producing an effect grand and beautiful. There are other chambers and passages, until at last you are brought to a stand by a wall of solid rock, from under which flows a stream of water. This water runs through a great part of the cavern, is lost, and reappears at the entrance. Near the termination of one of the passages is a projecting pile of rocks, distinguished by the name of Roger Rain's House, the genius of rain being supposed to have made it his habitation from the circumstance of water incessantly falling in large drops through the crevices of the roof.

Camden, writing in the age of Elizabeth, describes this cave as one "that gapeth with a wide mouth, and hath many turnings and retyring rooms; wherein, forsooth, Gervase of Tilbury, whether for want of knowing, or upon a delight he had in fabling, hath written that a shepherd saw a very wide and large country, with riverets and brookes running heere and there through it, and huge pooles of dead and standing water."

The posts represented in the Engraving are the remains of a packthread or twine manufactory formerly carried on in the cavern. Here the parties had ample space to pursue their avocations without any obstructions from the weather. A cottage was built here, also, on which the sun never shone and the rain never fell. Its appearance in such a place must have had a singular effect, and the shrill cry of the cordwinders and the busy hum of the numerous twisting-wheels struck the ear, we are told, with a hollow and unnatural sound.

"We understand," says the Staffordshire Advertiser, "that Sir Robert Peel has commenced legal proceedings against several of his constituents, including the ex-Mayor, for removing an obstruction recently placed by him in the River Tame.'

OCTOGENARIANS IN THE PEERAGE.—Lord Sinclair is the oldest member of the Peerage of the United Kingdom, having been born in 1768, and, which is stranger still, he has held the honours of the Peerage for no less than eighty-four years—a period, we believe, without precedent. His Lordship is no longer a member of the House of Peers, having ceased to hold a Scotch representative Peerage at the late general election. The oldest members of the House of Lords at this moment are Lord Lyndhurst and the Earls of Stair and Guilford, who were born in 1772; next follow the Archbishop of Armagh and Lord Combermere, born in 1773; Lords Gormanston and Reay, and the Earls of Charlemont and Dundonald, born in 1775; Earl Onslow, the Bishop of Exeter, and Viscount Southwell, born in 1777; the Earls of Beverley and Manvers, and Lords Brougham and Arbuthnott, born in 1778; and the Earls of Strafford and Radnor, and Lords Gough and Seaton, born in 1779.

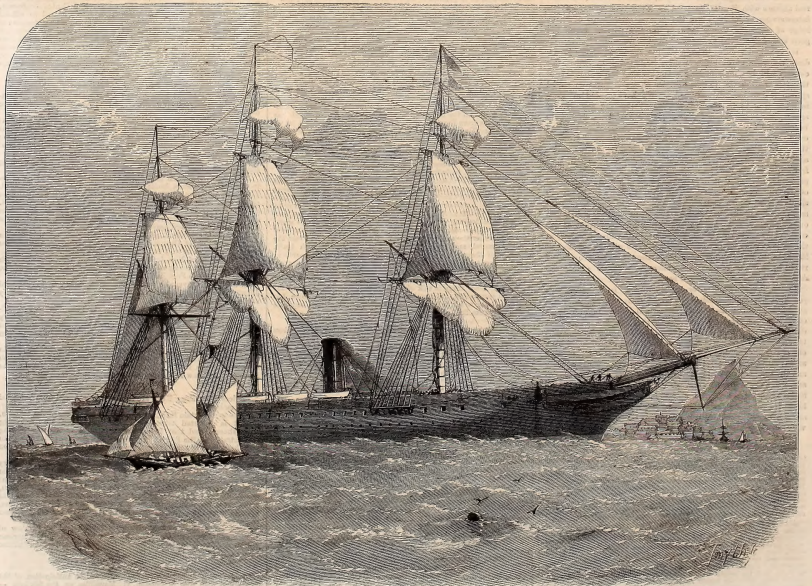
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.



No. 1015.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

WE have been officially informed that it will not be until Monday next that the public will be in possession of the text of the treaty which has been concluded between France and this country. Enough, however, of its nature and objects has transpired to enable us to know that by the terms of the treaty we enter into a contract to reduce, or, perhaps, wholly to remit, our import duties on French manufactures, and especially on silks, wines, and brandies. On her part France undertakes to remove prohibitions, and, to a large extent, to reduce the duties imposed, on English manufactures, and coal and iron in particular. The abstract value of such an international system of barter few persons, we fancy, are bold enough to deny. But we hear in some quarters whence we should hardly expect, and from others whence we might expect, criticism on the mode in which this new relation between the two countries has been brought out. Those who are still obstinate in their dissent from the principles of free trade sneer, as their manner is (they have long since ceased to argue), and insinuate an indifference to the interests of England in the arrangement, while Free-traders—pure and simple, as they call themselves, but whom we rather would designate as abstract disciples of that creed—urge that there has been a departure from its doctrines. The answer to both classes of objections is, as we hold, the same, and in endeavouring to give that answer we do not propose to deal with the ground of their objections separately: if we prove our case against the dissenting Free-traders it will be found that we include the arguments of those who mutter protection as the only means of promoting the interests of this country. One of the first principles of free trade we take to be that it is self-acting, and does not require the assistance of specific bargains. The main moving element of the system is that if we give we receive as a necessary consequence. It is pretty generally comprehended now in this country that the more we import from abroad the better for our trade, and for the obtaining of articles which we could not reach in any other mode, and that we gain a proportionate power of production by ourselves of those articles which are more or less peculiar to our manufactures, and which we are capable of exporting in exchange for others. If the question is looked at from this point of view it will be seen that the reduction of our duties on the productions of another country is not to be argued as a favour to that country, but simply as a benefit to ourselves, in the increase of a trade the value of which is derived from the comforts and enjoyments which it multiplies amongst us. If in regulating our trade with any foreign country we demand contracts involving reciprocity we at once abandon the principles on which our commercial system is based. We believe, and have proved, those principles to be right and sound, and our only duty is to assert and act up to them. It is on the inevitable influence of those principles that we rely; and it is not for us t be false to them because another nation timidly yields to them a half-acceptance. The existence of protective duties on the commodities of any foreign nation must be held and admitted by us to be a deflection from our acknowledged system; and all lingering impediments to commercial intercourse we must be prepared from time to time to relinquish without waiting for corresponding action on the part of foreign countries. Of course if the foreigner is tempted by our liberality to relinquish his prohibitory or protective duties we shall be so much the gainers; but what we wish to impress, and to assert, is, that by the abolition of our restrictive duties we are absolute gainers in the very teeth of protection abroad.

In an especial manner is this our position with reference to France. We have still a large number of articles which we import from France which are subject to duties which come under the designation of protective. Besides wines, brandies, and silks, there are some curious items of impost—curious, we mean, in relation to the amount of duty paid on them. The highest amount received on minor articles is from the duty on gloves, the next on artificial flowers, and the next on eggs. It may not, perhaps, be generally known that we import a considerable amount of sugar from France, testing it by the amount of duty paid on it. Now, if in the settlement of the terms of the commercial treaty we have dealt with these duties, it can only be considered as an act founded on the truest principles of free trade; for, according to our view of those principles, there should never have been any such duties at all. As to the objection that it is not in accordance with the rules of free trade to regulate our system of trade with another country by means of a commercial treaty, the answer is, that every country has its own machinery for the conduct and arrangements of its own affairs, whether legislative or commercial. It is, we believe, indispensable to the carrying out of measures of the kind which have been agreed on between the two countries that it should be submitted to the proper agencies for authorisation in France in the shape of a treaty, just as in England our fiscal plans are embodied in resolutions and bills which are laid before Parliament. No tenable exception can, therefore, be taken to the proceeding by way of treaty, in order that the formalities of the arrangement may be in accordance with the institutions of France.

But the main argument which has been argued against the proposed treaty is, that it imposes on us the obligation of abandoning duties which have been retained only because they were necessary to revenue, and that it implies the necessity of having recourse to other modes of taxation to supply the deficiency thus occasioned. When the question is considered from this point of view it is only necessary to remember that the treaty is hardly less political than commercial. Indeed, we might go further and contend that it is a great deal more political than commercial. Given the premise that it is desirable by every means to cement and prolong an alliance with Fance, and the deduction is obvious. If we give up some import duties which have hitherto been relied on for revenue the question resolves itself into one of policy. We must set against the advantages we derive from the imposts which we abolish the advantages which we expect to derive from a thorough, real alliance with France, founded as much, and more, on the interweaving of interests and the mutual interchange of knowledge of men and things between the two nations as on the good will of Monarchs or the wisdom of Statesmen.

We have endeavoured to show that, in the event of the immediate reduction of duties on articles imported from France, this country will be simply making a further step in the direction of that free trade on the broad principles on which our commercial system is now unequivocally based. We have pointed out that, in being true to those principles, notwithstanding any primary appearances to the contrary, this country can calculate on positive benefit from her more ready reception of commodities from foreign countries, even if there is not perfect reciprocity on the part of those countries. We believe it to be the duty of England to assert, by its practical application, the truth of the doctrine of free trade, in the soundness of which, and in its capability of producing advantage even in the case of a one-sided adoption of it, she confidently relies. But when there is added to all this the direct gain of an alliance with France, such as has never yet existed, as the consequence of our throwing open our ports to her articles of export, the culminating point of the case has been reached. It only remains to consider whether, in the augmentation of our friendly intercourse with France and all its attendant benefits, we find compensation for the necessity of recurring to other sources of taxation in order to supply the deficiency in the revenue caused by the reduction or abolition of duties on French produce or manufactures. In weighing this part of the subject it must not be forgotten how complete is the guarantee given for the peace of the world by the perfect accord of France and England. Together, they are the arbiters and dictators of Europe. In their hands will lie the preservation of that tranquillity and order which this country must regard as the basis of her happiness and prosperity. In extended trade, in increasing manufacture, and the consequent demand for agricultural products and the employment of labour, we shall find an ample return for any direct demand made on us for the monetary supplies of the State. In a spirit derived from such considerations as we have here indicated we trust that the people of this country will sagaciously and thoughtfully deliberate on the great fiscal measures which are about to be submitted for their acceptance.

The Registrar-General's Quarterly Return.—The quarterly return of births, deaths, and marriages for the last quarter of the year 1859 are highly satisfactory—the increase of births and the decrease of deaths being very marked. It is estimated that the natural increase in the population of the United Kingdom during the year must have been upwards of 1000 daily. The returns afford substantial evidence of the efficacy of good drainage and other sanitary arrangements in large towns, and attention is directed to the great improvement in the health of the labouring population in those districts where public-spirited landowners have introduced a new and superior class of cottages. Pauperism has gradually declined.

Railway Statistics. — From a Parliamentary return just issued it appears that on the 30th of June, 1858, 147,422 persons were employed on the railways (open and not open) of the United Kingdom; while on the 30th of June, 1859, the number was 150,245. At the end of June, 1858, the total length of the lines authorised was 13,749 miles; the length open for traffic, 9323; the length in course of construction, 1013; the length "neither open nor in course of construction," 3412. At the end of June, 1859, the length of the lines authorised was 13,949 miles; the length open, 9796; the length in course of construction, 993; and the length "neither open nor in course of construction," 3160.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE POPE AND THE EMPEROR.

On Sunday the Univers contained the encyclical letter of the Pope, dated Jan. 19, addressed to all Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, Bishops, and others in communion with the Apostolic See, stating the motives of his refusal to accept the advice of the Emperor to give up the Romagna. The following is an extract:—"We cannot abdicate the said provinces without breaking solemn oaths; without exciting complaints and insurrection in the remainder of our States; without weakening the rights of Italian Princes unjustly despoiled of their dominions, and of all Princes throughout the Christian world, who could not behold with indifference the introduction of certain very pernicious principles. His Majesty is well aware by what men, what money, and what help revolt at Ravenna and Bologna has been accomplished. Moved with that paternal charity which commands us to watch over the eternal welfare of all, we have reminded him that all must one day be called to strict account before Christ's tribunal, and that all, therefore, must place their reliance more upon mercy than justice." The letter concludes by demanding the prayers and the aid in every possible manner of the ecclesiastics to whom it is addressed. In the Univers a typographical distinction in favour of the Pope as against the Emperor was sustained throughout.

On Monday the Moniteur published a decree of the Emperor suppressing the Univers, and stating as reasons for this measure the irritating controversy of this journal, by which religious opinion was disconcerted, the country agitated, and the fundamental basis on which are established the relations between the Church and civil society undermined—this journal having further published doctrines tending to resuscitate pretensions which the ancient French Monarchy had always struggled against. In the Ministerial report in the Moniteur which precedes the decree it is said the Emperor will show himself no less careful than his predecessors to make national traditions respected.

The French Government followed up its suppression of the Univers by giving a second "warning" to the Correspondent, another "religious" journal of Paris. The Government accompanied this measure by publishing in the Moniteur a declaration that violent articles, in reply to the Univers, "are henceforth without motive and without excuse," and that religious questions "must be discussed with that quietness and moderation which are ordered by the interests of public peace and respect for religion."

It is said that M. Louis Veuillot, resolved not to be silenced altogether, will continue at Brussels the publication of the Univers.

The Constitutionnel publishes an article signed by its chief editor, M. Grandguillot, expressing regret that the Romish Court is still bent under the influence of Austria as before the war. The Pope having refused to follow the advice given by Napoleon III., the duty of France is fulfilled. The counsel of France will never be changed into menaces or compulsion. The injustice towards her is great, but it will never cause her to depart from her character of moderation and protection. France would, if necessary, still defend the Pope against anarchy in Rome, but, should the political authority of the Holy Father be everywhere else doomed to experience another crisis, the responsibility would not fall on the generous nation who has done everything for warding it off, and who will always be ready to grant to the Pope that support and assistance which is misapprehended to-day.

RUMOURED ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.

The project for the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, which was first advocated by the Opinion Nationale, and as to which the semi-official journals in France spoke with the utmost reserve, is now openly alluded to as almost a fait accompli. A Montpellier journal, which sometimes has official information—the Messager du Midi—states that Count Cavour is disposed to cede Savoy and Nice to France; and that since his advent to power the Avenir, which had been most severely warned by M. Ratazzi, speaks more freely. The Pays of Tuesday evening says:—"Numerous deputations from Savoy, composed of persons of high standing, arrive daily in Paris." The municipal elections have just taken place at Chambery. The Ministerial journal of Chambery presented a list of candidates opposed to the annexation of Savoy to France. The Courier of the Alps, a Conservative paper, favourable to the annexation to France, proposed another list of candidates. This list has prevailed, and obtained two-thirds of the votes. It is asserted, says a despatch from Berlin, that the arrangement between France and Sardinia respecting the cession of Savoy was agreed upon previous to the war in Italy, and was to be executed in case Austria should entirely evacuate Italy. It was also agreed that Chablais, Faucigny, and Geneva should be ceded to Switzerland. A report published in some Belgian papers that Switzerland had addressed a demand to the Powers that, in the event of Savoy being annexed to France, Chablais, Faucigny, and the Genevese should be ceded to Switzerland, has been (we learn from Berne on Wednesday) officially denied. A letter in Tuesday's Times from "Senex," generally supposed to be Lord Lyndhurst, insists that the cession of Savoy to France is part of the arrangement between King Emmanuel and the Emperor—though it will not be carried out till the latter has secured Central Italy to Sardinia. "Senex" objects to the cession, that it places all Northern Italy, including Turin, at the mercy of the Emperor.

The Governor of Chambery, on the contrary, has declared that the Sardinian Government never had the intention of ceding Savoy to France; and the Courrier des Alpes (a Savoy journal) of the 25th ult. was seized for an article advocating the annexation of Savoy to France. The Gazette de Savoie declares that not only is Savoy far from unanimous in desiring an annexation to France, but that the great majority of its inhabitants have pronounced for union with the new monarchy under the sceptre of King Victor Emmanuel; and that the material, moral, and political interests of Savoy are with Italy. Moreover, if there should at any time be a question of separating from Piedmont, Chablais, Faucigny, and a portion of the Genevese territory, amounting to nearly half the country, would vote in preference for annexation to Switzerland.

At Nice, also, there is talk of a vigorous resistance against the projected annexation. General Garibaldi, a native of that town, has written a letter to his fellow-citizens, urging them not to separate their cause from that of Italy.

The Emperor presided on Saturday last at the Council of Ministers and the Privy Council. The Empress was also present.

On Thursday week Lord Cowley hunted with the Emperor Napoleon in the forest of Fontainebleau; and on the same day M. Thouvenel paid his visites d'etiquette to the Papal Nuncio and the Ambassadors of Austria, Great Britain, and Russia.

The Emperor has ordered a medal to be struck at the Paris Mint to perpetuate the remembrance of the commercial treaty between England and France.

A report has been presented to the Emperor by Marshal Randon, Minister of War, containing suggestions for the more rapid mobilisation and better provisioning of troops in case of war. A decree enacting the measures recommended follows the report.

ITALY.

Count de Cavour has issued a diplomatic circular, recapitulating the facts which show the impossibility of restoring the old rule in Central Italy, and declaring that he will never be wanting in his duty towards Europe and Italy. The Sardinian Government has ordered the workmen to accelerate the extraordinary works intrusted to the forges at the Royal arsenals. The Marquis Massimo d'Azeglio has been appointed Governor of Milan; M. Ratazzi has left for Nice. A public ball was given on the 24th at Milan for the relief of the emigrants from Venice and the other provinces of Italy subject to Austria. The sale of the tickets produced nearly a thousand pounds

Letters from Rome describe the Pope as being as resolute as ever, and quite bent on saving or losing all. A body of the Roman nobility, chiefly office-holders under the Papal Government, signed an address to the Congress vindicating the Papal system, and praying for its continuance. But the dissidents were eminent and considerable. Amongst them were the names of Doria, Piombino, Rosigliosi, the richest of the Roman aristocracy, and Torlonia, the banker. On the 22nd ult. another great political demonstration was made at Rome to protest against the address to the Pope from a portion of the nobility. An immense crowd assembled upon the Place Colonna, when they raised shouts of "Vive Napoleon!" "Vive la France!" "Vive Victor Emmanuel!" "Down with Antonelli!" "Down with the Government of the priests!" General de Goyon has since published an order of the day, declaring that his mission is to preserve tranquillity, and that he must prevent any further manifestation. The agitation, however, continued. Civita Vecchia is still being fortified by the French, who appear to be making every preparation for a permanent occupation.

Agitation increases in Venetia, and the position of the Austrian officials and troops becomes daily more difficult. At Venice the theatres are all closed, because the inhabitants, by way of making a "political demonstration," abstain from frequenting them. As soon as the Austrian bands begin to play in the Piazza di San Marco every Venetian withdraws from the place; and any man who may venture to stay is sure to be insulted, if not assaulted. Indeed, thirty-six persons have already been arrested for insults and assaults of the kind. At Verona seven Austrian officers are said to have been stabbed or otherwise wounded in one day, and cavalry had to clear the streets. At several places the tricoloured Italian flag has been hoisted during the night.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

Deputations of the Senate and of the Chamber of Deputies have waited on the Queen to present addresses of congratulation on the birth of the Infanta Donna Maria de la Concepcion. Her Majesty, in her reply to the address of the Chamber of Deputies, said:—"Everything conspires to make this evening one of the most happy of my life. God grants my wifely wishes and fulfils all my ambition as a Queen. The offspring which the Divine Providence grants us is a new pledge of happiness for me and for my august spouse."

Marshal O'Donnell has not yet commenced the attack of Tetuan, his troops being occupied in securing and fortifying their position at the mouth of the river, and in landing provisions and stores. The construction of a railway from Ceuta to Tetuan has been commenced.

On Wednesday, we learn by a telegram from Madrid, considerable Moorish forces attacked the right wing of the Spanish encampment, but were repulsed. The Spanish then made an attack on the Moorish lines, threw the Moors into disorder, and took their positions, which they maintained until the end of the fight. The Spanish artillery caused enormous losses to the enemy, estimated to amount to 2000. The Spanish lost 200. The victory was complete. The brother of the Emperor commanded the Moors.

PORTUGAL.

The Cortes were opened by the King in person on Thursday week; but his speech, except the statement that Portugal is on friendly terms with all States, contained nothing of importance.

PRUSSIA.

There has of late been no material change in the state of health of the King of Prussia, but the Prince Regent has latterly also been an invalid.

Wednesday week was the second anniversary of the marriage of the Princess Royal. The Prince Regent gave a grand dinner at Berlin in honour of the day, and Lord Bloomfield a soirée-concert.

A letter from Berlin of the 27th, in the Gazette du Peuple, contains the following:—"We learn that the Prussian Government is on the point of acceding to the treaty of commerce concluded between France and England on conditions which cannot but be well received by the country from commercial reasons as well as for advantages in a political point of view."

A Committee of the Chamber of Nobles in Prussia has commenced the examination of the Marriage Bill. The clause for allowing civil marriages to be effected at the choice of the parties was supported by only one member, and that for rendering civil marriages obligatory was rejected by seven votes to five. "The discussion in the Upper Chamber," says the National Gazette of Berlin, "will not give a better result, and the fate of the bill may consequently be considered as decided."

DENMARK.

In the sitting of the Diet on Monday M. Hausen brought before the Chamber, on behalf of the representatives of Central Schleswig, his motion with reference to the language to be used in official documents. The Royal Commissary thereupon read the decision of the King, that the said proposal of the members of the Diet was not to be taken into consideration. M. Hausen, however, declared that he would not withdraw his motion. Count Baudissin then moved that, as the question was of an urgent and serious character, it be referred to a Select Committee of eleven members. This motion was agreed to by 27 to 14 votes.

UNITED STATES.

No Speaker has yet been chosen by the House of Representatives, and there seems no likelihood that an election will soon be effected.

The Senate has confirmed the appointment of Mr. Faulkner as Ambassador to France. A bill has been introduced in the Senate for the suppression of invasion of one State by another. A resolution was also pending for a committee to inquire into the expediency of reducing the ocean postage.

The Governor of Nebraska has vetoed the bill passed abolishing slavery in that territory.

Additional details are given in the papers of the Lawrence catastrophe. Several more bodies have been recovered and identified. The safe of the company in which the books were stored has been drawn out. It was open, but a portion of the books was preserved. One of them, more violent than the others, completed the destruction of the remaining and the church gradually destroyed. LITERATURE.

POEMS AND PICTURES. Sampson Low and Co.

This is a collection of ballads, songs, and other poems, illustrated by English artists. The poems are selected chiefly from the works of English and American authors, but there are several translations from the German of Körner, Langbein, Jarnyc, &c. The illustrations, which are very numerous, are taken from pictures by Cope, Dyce, Creswick, Horsley, Redgrave, Pickersgill, Duncan, &c.; and the engravings are by Linton, Dalziel, Gray, Thompson, &c. It need hardly be said that in a work of this character, which is intended as an addition to the drawing-room tables of the early year, every possible pains has been taken in the selection of sketches and in the general execution of the ornamental part of the volume. We engrave two subjects in our Journal of this week. The first illustration is an engraving from a picture by J. C. Horsley, engraved by C. Gray, the subject being taken from the following lines of Dryden, and entitled "The Lover":—

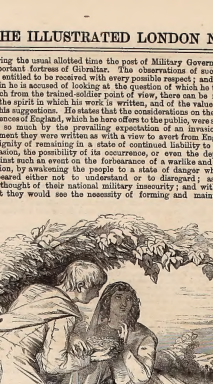
He preferr'd me
Above the maidens of my age and rank.
Still shunn'd their company, and still sought mine.
I was not coy by gifts, of which he gave
And all his gifts, though small, yet spoke his love:
He pick'd the earliest strawberries in the spring,
The cluster'd filberts and the purple grapes:
He taught a sparrow first to speak my name:
And when he found a nest of nightingales
Or unfledged thrushes, he would show 'em me,
And let me take 'em out.

The other is an illustration of Allan Cunningham's ballad-poem of "Sir Roland Graeme," and is from a drawing by H. C. Selous, engraved by W. J. Linton. The lines from which the Sketch is taken run thus:—

A dash was heard in the moonlit Esko,
And up to the side of green
Fair Edith Selby came with a shriek,
And stood by the bright between.
"Oh! spare him, Sir Richard," she held her white hands,
All spotted with blood 'mauk' the scarcities braids.

Young Roland look'd down on his true-love and smiled;
Sir Richard look'd also, and said,
"Curse on him, but true love would sunder!" he sheath'd
With his broad palm his berry-brown blade.
And long may the Selbys, shroud and at hame,
Find a friend and a foe like the good gallant Graeme.

THE GORDIAN KNOT: A Story of Good and of Evil. By SHIRLEY BROOKS. With Illustrations by JOHN FRANCIS BENTLEY.

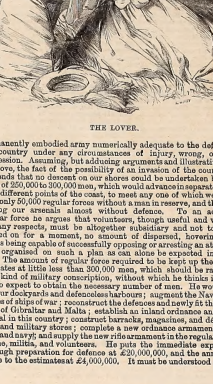


Our readers may remember when the first number of "The Gordian Knot" appeared we thought it of sufficient importance to give an Engraving from one of its illustrations. The favourable opinion which we then formed of the work has been amply justified. Mr. Shirley Brooks—the Jules Janin of our English literature—affords another of the rare examples in which we find a perfect union of the critical with the creative faculty. His novel is by far the best of the season—best in point of wit, plot, and moral principle. It is a modern novel in general labour under a sad want of reality. Like the square moons we sometimes see upon the stage, there is always something appearing which renders illusion impossible. We cannot find this fault with "The Gordian Knot." It is a real picture of life painted with a terrible fidelity, unveiling the skeletons which lurk, in good society, and sometimes even in all their deformity. Few of us but have had some experience of the like scenes, known but to people, and almost never see a like catastrophe. Most authors can introduce us to a set of lay figures which when good at we can forget; but few are privileged to form acquaintances for us whom we can never dismiss, and whom we never delight to remember. When we say that Mr. Shirley Brooks has attained to the latter distinction we pay the highest compliment to his talent, and admit that he has reached the highest point in the vocation as a writer of fiction, and that in any future work his task will be, not to increase, but to sustain a reputation already made and so deserved.

We do not think that the success of "The Gordian Knot" is due solely to the fact that the characters are real living beings in it. Both are eminently attractive, but the work has deeper charms, which will secure for it a more enduring popularity. The author has fearlessly, yet at the same time delicately, grappled with a great social evil. He has touched it in a way in which it has never yet been touched; but still in a way which cannot fail to form the most fastidious drawing-room table. This is, in itself, a great success. It is a pity that the only class which can really help in the great work of reformation should not have the opportunity of learning the extent of an evil which is a great blot upon our present civilisation. In the hands of such men as Mr. Shirley Brooks the author's desk takes its place with the pulpit as the stand of a moral teacher. Not that the book is a sermon, or anything like a sermon, but we do not envy the man or woman who can read it with an unsoftened heart. They will be dead to all the generous principles of our nature if they do not resolve from thenceforth to walk more uprightly and to judge more tenderly.

In the conception and the treatment of the plot Mr. Brooks has been true to his title. It is a well-woven knot; but his skill has been so exercised in its gradual unravelment that there has been no necessity for any recourse to the summary process of cutting even a single thread. It need hardly be said that all through there are evidences of that dramatic power which the author has given so many proofs of his possessing; and, if here and there the impulse of the art-power lures him on to a touch of melodrama, one is not inclined to designate as a fault that which is only a trifling redundancy. In the delineation and the working out of the characters of the tale nothing is more marked than the thorough individuality of each of them, while the gradual influence of the circumstances by which they are surrounded is naturally developed. The force of contrast, too, is skilfully depicted, and the operation not only of active interference, but of contact on the feelings of the different persons who are grouped together for the purposes of the story, is equally well unfolded and elaborated. On the whole, every one of the personages who move through the scenes of the tale is made to act uniformly in consequence with his or her peculiar idiosyncrasies, and they appear before us just as they would have lived, supposing that they were living instead of fictitious creatures. As the work was originally produced in monthly numbers we can only say that we find that it came before us in a complete shape, because we are able to state that we read it right through without a pause, and this we take to be the best tribute that a reader can pay to an author. Before concluding we must add a hearty word of praise to Mr. Bentley, whose faithful pencil has entered into a genial alliance with the pen of the author. The illustrations are more than ordinary spirit, and his labour has evidently been one of pleasure and one of love.

POLITICAL AND LEGISLATIVE CONSIDERATIONS ON NATIONAL DEFENCE, ADDRESSED TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND. By General Sir ROBERT GARDINER, G.C.B., Royal Artillery. Byfield. Hawksworth, and Co.



This is a book written by an officer of one of our scientific corps, of acknowledged ability and acquirements, and great experience acquired in continual active service in the Peninsular War, and who has been one of the few artillery officers who have been recognised as the fitting persons to appoint to commands, inasmuch as he held during the usual allotted time the post of Military Governor of the important fortress of Gibraltar. The observations of such a man are entitled to be received with every possible respect; and, if in the main he is accused of looking at the question of which he treats too much from the trained-soldier point of view, there can be no doubt of the spirit in which his work is written, and of the value of many of his opinions. He states that the considerations on the national defences of England, which he here offers to the public, were suggested not so much by the prevailing expectation of an invasion at the moment they were written as with a view to avert from England the indignity of remaining in a state of continued liability to menaced invasion, the possibility of its occurrence, or even the dependence against such an event on the forbearance of a warlike and powerful nation, by awakening the people to a state of danger which they appeared either not to understand or to disregard; as well as to thought of their national military insecurity; and with a hope that they would see the necessity of forming and maintaining a permanently embodied army numerically adequate to the defence of the country under any circumstances of injury, wrong, or actual aggression. Assuming, but adducing arguments and illustrative cases to prove, the fact of the possibility of an invasion of the country, he contends that no descent on our shores could be undertaken but by a force of 250,000 to 300,000 men, which would advance in separate bodies from different points of the coast, to meet any one of which we should have only 50,000 regular forces without a man in reserve, and this after leaving our arsenals almost without defence. To an adequate regular force he argues that volunteers, though useful and valuable in many respects, must be altogether subsidiary and not to be depended on for a moment, no amount of dispersed, hovering light troops being capable of successfully opposing or arresting an attacking force organised on such a plan as can alone be expected in such a case. The amount of regular force required to be kept up the author estimates at little less than 300,000 men, which should be raised by some kind of military conscription, without which he thinks it hopeless to expect to obtain the necessary number of men. He would fortify our dockyards and defenceless harbours; augment the Navy in all classes of ships of war; reconstruct the defences and newly fit the armament of Gibraltar and Malta; establish an inland ordnance and naval arsenal in this country; construct barracks, magazines, and depôts of arms and military stores; complete a new ordnance armament of our army and navy; and supply the new rifle armament in the regular army, marine, militia, and volunteers. He puts the immediate expense of thorough preparation for defence at £20,000,000, and the annual increase to the estimateast £4,000,000. It must be understood that all these results are argued out ably, and as legitimate deductions from the premises laid down. The chances and causes of hostility between England and any other nation, but France in particular, are very fully considered; while the best mode of preserving an alliance with the latter country is intimated with not a little knowledge of the subject. One principle is laid down, in which we are much inclined to concur, that England may fight for France in a righteous cause, or against France, but in no circumstances ought she to fight with France. Fighting with England against any other nation, France is to England too much of a competitor ever to be an ally. On the whole, if we are somewhat startled by the breadth and extent of Sir R. Gardiner's propositions for the defence of the country, it is certain that his work is eminently suggestive, and cannot but contribute towards the better understanding and final settlement of this important question.

PICTURES OF THE CHINESE, DRAWN BY THEMSELVES. Described by the Rev. R. H. COBBOLD, M.A., Rector of Broseley, Salop. Murray.

This is an exceedingly amusing, not to say interesting, book. A residence of eight years among the Chinese at Ningpo, with frequent opportunities of travel in the provinces of Chekiang, has enabled Mr. Cobbold, late Archdeacon of Ningpo, to present to the public a series of sketches of Chinese manners and life, the like of which have not probably been seen before. The book is full of pen-and-ink sketches contributed by a native artist, which, as they are declared by the author to be faithful representations of different types of the Northern Chinese, are certainly not the least valuable part of the work. The contour of the figures differs much from the prevailing type of the south, to which we have been accustomed, and so far affords a pleasing variety in a number of women, is in itself an illustration of the advanced state of competition for subsistence in the Celestial Empire. Then we have, besides an infinity of ordinary street scenes and characters, dinners, blind seers, blind drivers, collectors of refuse hair, collectors of scraps of paper, physiognomists, &c.—all struggling in the race for bread with an intensity and in numbers that almost, if not entirely, outstrips the industrial diffusion of efforts to live in the teeming population of our own metropolis. Nothing can be more to the taste than the mode in which Mr. Cobbold has told his experience in a little known field, and he has done it well. He has succeeded in giving his readers a vivid picture of Chinese habits and customs in a shape which, though not elaborate, is as likely to be accurate as if he had adopted the most solemn form of a book of travels.

THE RELIQUES OF FATHER PROUT, late P.P. of Watergrasshill, County of Cork, Ireland. Bohn.

A literary custom of reprinting from magazines which has arisen of late years is enlarging its borders very considerably. Scarcely a week but some scarce book with a taking title, which on examination proves to be a collection of papers which ought to have preserved their original fugitive shape. Sometimes, of course, the resurrection presents us with something better than the bones; but, as a rule, we are inclined to think these cases are the exception, and not the rule. We suppose that in what is called "railway reading" is to be found the best kind of thing. Although we should hesitate to place the "Reliques of Father Prout" in the category of those books which consist of muscular and well-formed "disjecta membra" stories, by a literary rule, considering the length of time which has elapsed since most of the papers were written, and the passing away of the particular genius of the age from which they sought their inspiration, we think that there might have been a more careful weeding of the matter than it appears has been undertaken by the editor of the present volume. At the same time it would be the worst of foolishness to attempt to deny that there is a generous feast given here which is eminently worth preservation, and which is put into excellent and clear preservation by Mr. Bohn in the publication of this work as a part of his "Illustrated Library." The fine old Irish humour of Father Prout, which crowd the pages of the book, would be enough to establish Mr. Mahony's claim to be called (as an effect he certainly has been as a scholar, linguist, humorist, and poet. Again, the publication has a peculiar value, as it is a record of a period which, despite of some recent galvanic attempts to resuscitate it, has died out with the lives of its professors. One has only to point to the statement made by Mr. Prout, that in the course of the last seven writers in Fraser's Magazine in 1835, a collection of etched portraits of whom forms the frontispiece to the book, only eight are now living, in order to prove the dissolution of a school which was founded and upheld by a section of the authors there employed. Of that school Mr. Mahony may be called the rollicking literary era Mr. Mahony is now the sole representative, and that is a feeling of regret that such powers and acquirements as those possessed by this writer have not been applied, we will not say to a higher, but to a severer purpose. We once heard that Mr. Mahony talked of "The Lives of the Cardinals" as an idea. Is it too late for the realisation of that idea?

THE REVIVAL, IN ITS PHYSICAL, PSYCHICAL, AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS. By W. M. WILKINSON. Hurst and Hall.

It will, perhaps, be conceded to the writer of this book that the striking forms taken by what is called the "Religious Revival in Ulster" have attracted so largely the attention of the public that one may anticipate difficulty to a serious consideration of the subject has been overcome. It may also be admitted that all classes are satisfied that, however various their modes of accounting for the revival movement, they are in the presence of a great fact. We are, therefore, prepared for a discussion as to whether it be true, as many think, that it is due to the direct working of the Holy Spirit; or, as many others think, to the direct working of Satan to lead souls astray; or, as the Materialist thinks, that it is simply a reproduction, in a somewhat new form, of a physical disease. We, nevertheless, do not feel bound to allow that Mr. Wilkinson has brought those points to a satisfactory conclusion. That he examines results fairly, and endeavours for cause to exercise impartiality, we will not deny. That he gives us a good deal of the history of the singular movement is certain. But that he has set the vexed question which he raises at rest is by no means so clear. Those who are interested in this matter will, however, be glad to read his book, for the reason we have already stated.

It contains ample information respecting the Royal family and household, her Majesty's Ministers, heads of public departments, judges and law officers, the diplomatic service; the titles, offices, dignities, families, public career, and political principles of the Peers, with their town and country residences; biographical sketches of the members of the House of Commons; their offices, families, political principles, and town and country residences; with the places represented; the nature of the franchise; number of registered voters; poll at the last election; and other matters relating to the representation. It is an exceedingly well got-up and useful volume.

THE RIGHT HON. MATTHEW TALBOT BAINES.

OUR Obituary column last week contained a brief memoir of Mr. M. T. Baines, who died on Sunday, the 22nd ult., at his town house, Queen-square, Westminster. The following particulars are from the Daily News:—"The late right hon. gentleman was the eldest son of Mr. Edward Baines, formerly M.P. for Leeds, and proprietor of the Leeds Mercury, and was born in 1799. After completing his rudimentary education at Richmond School, Yorkshire, he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, at which University he gained respectable honours. He was senior optime in 1820, scholar of Trinity College, Dr. Hooper's declamation prizeman, and King William III.'s declamation prizeman. In 1825 he was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple and went the Northern Circuit, and became in 1841 a Queen's Counsel, and the same year was appointed a bencher of the Inner Temple. He was made Recorder of Hull in 1837, which office he held ten years. The lamented gentleman was returned to the House of Commons, as representative for Hull, in 1847, at the head of the poll, and continued to sit for that borough up to 1852, when he was elected, in conjunction with the late Sir G. Goodman, for Leeds, whose populous constituency he continued to represent up to the general election of 1859. On Lord John Russell's advent to power as First Lord of the Treasury, in 1849, Mr. Baines was selected to fill the office of President of the Poor-law Board, which office he held from January, 1849, to March, 1852, and, on the Earl of Aberdeen coming into office, Mr. Baines was reappointed to that department of the Government. In December, 1855, he was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, having accepted office in Lord Palmerston's first Ministry, and was a member of the Cabinet. He retired from office at the dissolution of the Palmerston Administration, and on the formation of the present Ministry was offered office, but declined, in order to make way for other political friends of Lord Palmerston. The right hon. gentleman was made a Privy Councillor in 1849, on being appointed President of the Poor-law Board, and was a Deputy Lieutenant of the West Riding of York and of Lancashire. He married, in 1833, Anne, only daughter of Mr. L. Threlfall, of Lancaster."

Our Portrait is from an excellent photograph by Mayall in the possession of the family.

THE ARMSTRONG BATTERIES FOR CHINA.

THE troops forming this part of the new Chinese expedition having been mustered and inspected at Woolwich on Saturday, the 14th ultimo, by Colonel Teesdale, commanding the garrison in the absence of General Sir Richard D'Acres, they proceeded to the Royal Arsenal Pier at eleven o'clock, where they embarked for the Himalaya troop ship, Captain John Seccombe, lying off Purfleet, where she had been receiving the new rifled ordnance and stores for the above-mentioned place, where the following officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates composing the staff, and Nos. 1 and 2 batteries 4th brigade Field Artillery, having embarked, the Himalaya left the Thames the next morning for Alexandria:—Lieut.-Col. and Brevet Col. E. W. Crofton, in chief command; Capt. R. J. Hay, belonging to the 2nd brigade Garrison Artillery; Capt. L. B. Brabazon, as Deputy-Assistant-Quartermaster-General; Lieut. H. J. Hickes, as Adjutant; Capt. and Lieut.-Col. W. L. Barry, in command of No. 1 battery; Second Capt. R. H. S. Rowley; Lieuts. H. M. Homer, H. P. Philpotts, and Briscoe; Capt. T. W. Milward, in command of No. 2 battery; Second Capt. Harrison; Lieuts. W. G. Branker, L. Gye, and Harvey; Assist. Surgeons W. T. Morgan, M.D., and H. Harrison; Veterinary Surgeon G. Longman; 22 sergeants, 12 corporals, 18 bombardiers, 200 gunners, 150 drivers, 2 farriers, 12 shoeing-smiths, 6 collarmakers, 4 wheelers, and 4 trumpeters—forming a total of 447 officers and men of all ranks; the medical department being under the entire superintendence of Assistant Surgeon A. Prescott, M.D.

The Himalaya, which next to the Great Eastern is the largest vessel in the world, is of 3550 tons register, and her length is over 372 feet. A view of the launch of this magnificent vessel appeared in our Journal of May 23, 1853; and in our volumes for 1854 other Engravings, accompanied by descriptive details, of the Himalaya were given.

HENDON UNION SCHOOLS, NEAR EDGWARE, MIDDLESEX.

THIS building is of brick throughout, having picked red bricks for facings, with Bath stone for the dressings of doors and windows. It accommodates one hundred children, fifty boys and fifty girls, with the necessary domestic establishment, and it has a frontage of about 160 feet by 110 feet in depth. On entering the centre hall, opposite you is the dining-hall, used also as the chapel, and suitably fitted up. The roof is an open stained timber roof, with arched ribs, and has two handsome Gothic corons hanging from the roof to light the hall. Beyond the dining-hall, and closely attached, are the kitchen, scullery, and the various offices and stores connected therewith. The building is divided into two separate wings, the one to the right of the entrance-hall being devoted to the boys, and that to the left to the girls, with master's and matron's apartments to each; also separate baths, dormitories, clothes-stores, &c., to each department. The infirmary is placed on the second floor, and is so arranged that in case of infectious diseases it can be at once shut off from the main building. The drainage and ventilation of the building have been carefully attended to. The cost of the building, with the various fittings connected with the domestic and scholastic departments, and lighting the building with gas, was about £4000, the whole being done under the superintendence of the architect, Mr. Charles H. Cooke, John-street, Bedford-row.

DRINKING-FOUNTAINS AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THESE fountains were designed by Mr. Sidney Smirke, the architect of the British Museum, and are classical in design to harmonise with the building. They are in the entrance doorway, under the portico, white marble, having a very chaste effect. The carving of the lions' heads is particularly fine. They were erected at the expense of the trustees of the British Museum.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1860.

THE event of the week is the "downright blow" with which the elected of the millions has "cloven the beaver" of the Ultramontanist champion, M. Veuillot. The suppression of the Univers, for publishing the encyclical letter of the Pope, and for making cause with that enemy of civilisation, is one of the kind strokes with which the Emperor of the French occasionally deems it wise to remind friends and foes that he has a very strong will of his own. Usually—

The Eagle suffers little birds to sing.
And is not count'd for aught in sober hours thereby,
Knowing that with the shadow of his wing
He could at once smudge their minstrelsy.

But the Imperial Eagle is not always so forbearing; and we must allow that, if the blow from beak and talon were ever just, it is in a case like the present, when a noisy bird of evil omen is silenced from an offensive clamour. But while we do not disapprove of the fierce but deserved condemnation of Ultramontanist teachings, the press of England can lend no applause to an act of arbitrary power. Better to let the priests and tools rage and rave to their hearts' content. That the Emperor is only repaying the Papal scribes in their own coin, and treating them as they and their masters desire that the free expression of opinion should everywhere be treated, is an excellent answer to them, but not to us. If we are looked to for a plaudit because a frantic bigot is gagged the lock will be in vain. We prefer that Ultramontane virulence and folly should be met in France as we meet it in Ireland—namely, with a shout of that healthy laughter which does more damage to superstition than anything else can, except printer's ink.

Our Parliamentary week has not been an idle one, though it does not give much promise of results. Certain "codifying" bills have been introduced for the improvement of the criminal law, but they have not been explained. On the other hand, an attempt by Mr. M'Mahon to obtain a court of criminal appeal has been successfully resisted by the Government. It is thought, at present, that an appeal to a convicted prisoner cannot be granted without also giving the public an appeal against what may be considered an improper acquittal; and, therefore, that there would be an endlessness of appeals and verdicts when the jurors' sense of responsibility was taken away. It is urged, also, that there are few or no unrighteous convictions, though numerous undeserved acquittals take place, and therefore that there is no ground for establishing a Court of Appeal, whatever may be from the Bench. Mr. Edwin James, however, though opposed to a court of appeal, urged that the revision of sentences by the Secretary of State ought to be conducted on a settled principle, and with a responsible Minister by his side. We scarcely see how any rule can be laid down for dealing with cases where mercy and exceptional nature forms their only title to be reweighed at all. But that "certainty" should be introduced into the criminal system itself, and that whatever sentence is pronounced by the Judge should accord with the offence for which he is pardoned be carried out, there can be no doubt. The "chances" of the law should end with the verdict. The measure for reforming the bankruptcy system will require the most careful attention.

Mr. Cowper, the First Commissioner, and an official who has seen a good deal of miscellaneous service, is the new Minister for our Works; and there can be no objection to the appointment, though the Ministry can hardly be said to be strengthened by it. The great Park-shrub question would have been the Chief Commissioner imported even had Lord Palmerston himself has come in to settle so weighty a matter, and commanded that the shrubs shall go back and the flowers be replanted. We hope that an "admiration committee" of nursery maids is already formed in the Premier's house for the admiration of themselves and their charges. Perhaps Mr. Cowper will apply himself to the more interesting question of the opening of what may at present be called Mosiey Bridge, at Westminster, very much wanted by those who walk to and about it, will he look at the state of the wide and important thoroughfare between Whitehall and the bridge? Dust in dry weather, foul mud and lagoons in wet, the approach to the Legislative Palace cannot have been worse in the days when Charles II. expecting his foreign bride, implored the Parliament to build a bridge, and a little more decent against the Queen's arrival. Lord Clive stood sowking at it for some months; but Baron Marochetti has sent him off to Shrewsbury. We shall doubtless find some other excuse for the new Minister; but here is a beginning of Cowper's Task.

Three elections have taken place. At Pontefract the Liberal has beaten the Conservative, and Mr. Childers sits. At Beverley the Conservative has beaten the Liberal, and Mr. Walker sits: and at Scarborough the Liberal has beaten another, and Mr. Denison sits. Gloucester has been shown to have been so corrupt that no writ is to issue without a week's notice, and Mr. Bright proposes that the notice should be ten years, during which time Gloucester, so crammed with freemen that its police force is a standing proverb, is to be the laughingstock of all constituencies that have not yet been found out.

Lord Campbell has finally settled that such new glorification as could be thrown around the memory of Shakspeare by means of a museum attached to his house, and an album in which visitors to the shrine might pour out their homage, shall not be awarded. He, on appeal, overthrows the will of Professor Shakspeare, so far as the bequest in honour of his great namesake is concerned. The decision is not much to be regretted. But we really do not see that Lord Campbell was called upon to pronounce a verdict of "handsome" upon the conduct of those who successfully opposed their deceased friend's will, and gained the money, merely because they were willing to pay the costs of the suit—costs who would have had the bequest, had the intention of the testator been carried out.

Details of a hideous accident in America, by the fall of an ill-constructed factory, have furnished an element of horror to the news of the week. The accident was the aggravated rioting in St. George's-in-the-East, where a congregation of ruffians of the worst kind is permitted to gather, and not a hint from a policeman's staff is given to scoundrels who tear up the seats and hurl Bibles about the church, is prominent, as is the fact that the Executive does not seem to know what to do in the matter. Colonel Waugh is stated to be living in splendour in the Rue Lord Byron, Paris; and, finally, Mr. John Scott, the horsetrainer, calls upon the universe to take notice that he did not elope with a lady who has had to obtain relief from Sir Cresswell Cresswell.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE IRISH ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS.—Mr. Cardwell's reply to the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops has been published. The right hon. gentleman states that the present system of mixed education has conferred great benefits upon Ireland; that the alterations suggested by the hierarchy would have the effect of fostering a spirit of religious animosity throughout the country; that the Government have, therefore, determined to maintain the educational machinery now in use. This decision forms a fresh triumph for Sir Robert Peel, the redoubtable Lion of St. Jarlath's. The Most Rev. Prelate states that "never were the views of the majority of an entire country so unanimous and unceremoniously disregarded;" and he tells Lord Palmerston that he "may rely on a determined opposition on the part of the people to carry out the instructions of their pastors, and to insist, by all constitutional means, on a change of system, or to obtain for themselves such a separate education as is not enjoyed by one national school."

The new postal service for Ireland will commence in June next, when the whole distance between the Pigeon House, on the West-land-row Station, Dublin, must be completed in 113 hours twice a day each way on week days, and once on Sundays. We presume that Ultramontane prayer trip for all delay beyond the 113 hours, except caused at sea by fog, snowstorms, or saving human life.

In reply to a copy of the resolutions passed at the recent Glasgow meeting concerning the religious persecution in Hungary, Lord Shaftesbury writes:—"I cannot understand how any British subject, having a regard for civil and religious liberty, any sense of justice for the unquestioned and unquestionable rights of the Hungarians to constitutional government, or any sense of the benefits and blessings he has enjoyed under his own, can hesitate to express the most heartfelt sympathy with that people in their present movement."

There are now 458 peers, spiritual and temporal, on the roll of the House of Lords. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales heads the list, and Henry Lord Tumbos is the last.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

St. Paul's Church, Haggerstone, which has been recently erected in Broke-road, Queen's-road, was duly consecrated on Monday by the Bishop of London in the presence of a large congregation. The incumbency of this church has been given to the Rev. W. Stone.

SPECIAL SERVICES AT ST. PAUL'S.—The following is the list of preachers at the special services at St. Paul's, appointed by the Bishop of London, for February:—February 5, the Rev. Henry Melvill, Canon of St. Paul's; February 12, the Rev. Dr. Thomson, Provost of Queen's College, Oxford; February 19, the Rev. T. Rowsell, of Stepney; February 26, the Lord Bishop of Carlisle.

CHURCH LEASEHOLDS.—Petitions to both Houses of Parliament from proprietors of church leaseholds in Lincolnshire are in course of signature, praying that, in the event of any enfranchisement of church property in the city and county of Lincoln, proper provision should be made for increasing the income of incumbencies in those localities which are now very inadequately endowed.

TESTIMONIALS.—On Monday evening the arge schoolroom in connection with St. Bartholomew's Church, Gray's-inn-road, was crowded to witness the presentation to the Rev. Edward Garbett, the Incumbent, of a memorial, written on vellum and elegantly framed, a silk gown and cassock, a valuable gold watch, a splendid tea and coffee service, and a purse of one hundred guineas, as a token of the gratitude of the congregation for his zealous and untiring efforts to emancipate the church from a debt of £1600 with which it was incumbered.——The Rev. Francis J. Leigh, M.A., Minister of St. Paul's, Jersey, has been presented with a complete set of silk robes, a timepiece, and other articles, by his congregation, in token of their regard.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF SIERRA LEONE.—On Thursday morning the Rev. Dr. Edward Hyndman Beckles was consecrated Bishop of Sierra Leone. The ceremony took place in the private chapel of Lambeth Palace, the Archbishop of Canterbury being assisted by the Bishops of London, Oxford, and Barbadoes. The see became vacant some months since by the death of Dr. Bowen, who, like his predecessors in the see—Drs. Vidall and Weeks—fell victims to the terrible climate. The Archbishop's Chaplain (the Rev. J. Thomas, Rector of Allhallows Barking) performed the service, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. T. Redwar, Incumbent of St. Thomas-in-the-Rolls, Chancery-lane. Dr. Beckles, the new Bishop, has for some years past held appointments in the dioceses of Barbadoes and Antigua.

THE REV. CANON WODEHOUSE has addressed a letter to the Bishop of Norwich, dated King's Lynn, January 21, tendering the resignation of his canonry, as well as the office of Chaplain to his Lordship. He assigns mainly, as the reason for taking this step, his inability to give his assent to certain parts of the Liturgy—viz., the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed, the form of absolution in the visitation of the sick, the words used at the imposition of hands in the ordination of priests, and the corresponding form in the consecration of bishops. He refers, also, to what he had done many years past in consequence of this discrepancy of views long entertained, stating that in 1844 he offered to Bishop Stanley to resign the preferments he then held. He expresses his conviction that "it is the form of ordination for priests which tends more than anything to generate and foster within our Church opinions and practices objectionable to Protestants." And, an ordination being appointed to take place in March next, he respectfully apprises the Bishop that, as he cannot take his usual part in the service, there appears, he says, but one course open to him, which is to resign the canonry and chaplaincy, having already resigned the rectory of St. Margaret's, Lynn.

A suspension and liberation has been presented to the High Court of Justiciary for a prisoner, on the ground that the offence of which he was found guilty—viz., "attempting to pick pockets"—is not an offence known to the law. The Lord Chief Justice Clerk has granted a warrant for his interim liberation, on his finding surety for £2 sterling.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The mortal remains of the late Sir William Ross, R.A., were deposited in the Highgate Cemetery last Saturday.

Middle-row, Holborn, is to be removed, at a cost, we are informed, of nearly £80,000.

At the meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday night a paper was read, by Dr. M'Gowan, on the "Arts and Manufactures of Japan." Sir Thomas Philips, chairman of the council, presided.

The Court of Common Pleas, on Wednesday, granted an application made by Mr. Ransome for an injunction against the Eastern Counties Railway Company, on the ground that they had given undue preference to the dealers in inland coal over those who sent seaborne coal by railway from Ipswich.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, Charles Sharp, James Slater, and Patrick Campbell were found guilty of breaking into the Church of St. John, Holloway, and stealing clerical robes and other articles. Sharp, an old offender, was sentenced to eight, the others to four, years' penal servitude.

At the sittings of the Court of Error on Wednesday their Lordships proceeded with the case the Earl of Shrewsbury v Scott and Another, which is a writ of error from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, involving the title to the Shrewsbury estates claimed by the Earl of Shrewsbury, and bequeathed by the late Earl to the son of the Duke of Norfolk.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—The great question of a separation of the contents of the British Museum has been decided. The separation is to take place. Last Saturday, at the meeting of trustees, the evidence on both sides was thoroughly sifted and ascertained, and the trustees resolved that science and literature should dwell in homes apart. The library remains in Great Russell-street. Professor Owen and his interesting family of beasts, birds, and fishes—bones, rocks, plants, and crystals—have notice to quit.

METROPOLITAN TYPOGRAPHICAL WIDOW AND ORPHAN FUND.—The tenth annual meeting of this flourishing society (which has for its object the securing of £20 at the death of a member) was held last Saturday night, at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street. The report showing that sixteen deaths had occurred during the year, and that a gradual accession of members had taken place, was unanimously received; and a resolution empowering a quarterly audit to receive publicity was carried. A bequest of £100 by the late G. Biggs, Esq., was announced as having been received.

THE SHRUBBERIES IN HYDE PARK.—At a meeting of the Marylebone Vestry, held on Saturday last, the recent destruction of the shrubberies in Hyde Park came under discussion. A letter from Lord Fermoy, which was read to the meeting, seems to set the matter at rest. He says:—"I have just seen Lord Palmerston about the very unsightly position of the shrubberies of Hyde Park at present. The result of my interview is that the shrubs will be replaced, and the ground at present disordered will be immediately laid out with flowering shrubs and flowers, which, I think, will be satisfactory to the public."

ROYAL DRAMATIC COLLEGE.—At a meeting of the members of this institution, held on Tuesday at the Adelphi Theatre—Mr. B. Webster in the chair—the report of the committee of management was read. Mrs. Garrick, it was announced, who had been enjoying the bounty of the institution, had died in October last, at Sunderland, and the members of the institution were asked to elect a pensioner in her place, and also three male pensioners. The report was adopted, and a poll commenced for the election of the number of pensioners specified. There were six male and six female applicants. The proceedings then terminated in the usual manner.

THE BUILDERS' STRIKE.—MEETING OF DELEGATES.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of delegates from the various trades' unions who assist the "lock-outs" was held at Shaftesbury Hall, Aldersgate-street, for the purpose of paying in the subscriptions voted by their respective societies—Mr. Develin (bootmaker) in the chair. Mr. Potter (having been called upon by the Chairman) said he was happy to inform them that they were enabled to strike a dividend of 4s. to 2300, and he thought that even this dividend would be increased by a little energy on the part of the delegates present. The report from the country was highly satisfactory, and the Amalgamated Engineers had paid their £1000.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.—A crowded meeting was held on Wednesday at Willis's Rooms, under the presidency of the Duke of Marlborough, when resolutions were unanimously passed condemnatory of the attempts which are in course of being made to obtain the legalisation of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. It was also determined to petition both Houses of Parliament in favour of maintaining the law on this subject as it now stands. Among the speakers were the Duke of Marlborough, Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of St. David's, Mr. Beresford Hope, the Rev. Dr. Jelf, Mr. J. C. Colquhoun, and the Dean of Westminster. The Earl of Shaftesbury was present for a short time, but took no part in the proceedings.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 1089 boys and 878 girls (in all 2067 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1691.——The deaths in London in the week that ended last Saturday were 1836. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1174. The mortality of last week exceeded to the extent of 95 deaths the number which the average rate of mortality as calculated for the fourth week of January would have produced. Last week sixteen infants died from suffocation, apparently by accident, and all, for the most part, in bed. Two persons died from privation. The oldest person who died last week was a widow, aged ninety-six years.

"DREADNOUGHT" SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL SOCIETY.—The thirty-ninth annual report of the progress of this society was on Saturday read at a general meeting of the governors of the charity, at their office, 86, King-William-street, City—T. H. Brooking, Esq., in the chair. The minutes of the former meeting having been agreed to, the secretary read the report, which stated that during the year ended January 31, 1860, 1782 in-patients and 1437 out-patients had received medical and clerical advice and attendance; 102 patients after being cured had been clothed wholly or partially, and eleven had received presents of shoes and stockings. A supply of fresh water had been laid on from the Kent Waterworks to the Dreadnought hospital-ship, at a cost of £120, and various other improvements had been effected on board the ship. The report was adopted, and a vote of thanks was proposed and carried to the auditors and the chairman.

AN ADVERTISING HOAX was exposed on Wednesday at the Westminster Police Court. The following advertisement had been inserted in some country papers:—"Profitable Employment.—Persons in search of employment, either as a source of income or to fill up their leisure hours, may hear of such, by which means £2 to £4 a week may be realised in town or country, and by either sex, station in life immaterial, by applying to Mr. H. Harvey, 35, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, London, inclosing eighteen postage-stamps, with a stamped directed envelope for reply." Some person having answered this, and, of course, received no reply, had communicated with the police. Inquiries were made, and it appeared that no such person as Mr. Harvey resided at 35, Upper Belgrave-place, Pimlico, but letters addressed to him were regularly fetched away. The magistrate (Mr. Paynter) was sure that the person calling himself Harvey was obtaining these postage-stamps in an improper manner, and he wished publicity to be given to the matter.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.—A meeting of this institution was held on Thursday, at its house, John-street, Adelphi—Thomas Chapman Esq., F.R.S., in the chair. The silver medal of the institution was presented to Captain Wasey, R.N., and John Fox, coxwain, in admiration of their gallant conduct in putting off, with others, in the society's life-boat stationed at Fleetwood, and rescuing during a very stormy night and morning seven men from the wrecked vessels Ann Mitchell, of Montrose, and Jane Roper, of Ulverstone. The crew of the life-boat received £23 for their gallant services. The second-service clasp was also voted to Daniel Shea, coxwain of the Padstow life-boat, belonging to the institution, for his noble services at the wreck of the ship James Alexander, of Liverpool. Also the silver medal and £1 to Mr. John Dyer, for wading into the surf and rescuing, at the peril of his life, the master of the schooner Beverley. Rewards amounting to £34 10s. were also voted to the crews of the institution's life-boats stationed at Redcar, Arklow, and Thorpe, for putting off during recent stormy weather, and rescuing twenty-six poor fellows from the wrecked vessels Fortuna, of Memel; Ann Mitchell, of Glasgow; and Pallas, of Liverpool. Rewards amounting to £52 were also granted to the crews of the institution's life-boats at Newbiggin, Portmadoc, Barmouth, Llanddwyn, and Carnarvon for putting off in reply to signals of distress from vessels, but their services were not afterwards required. Various other rewards were also voted for laudable exertions in saving life from different wrecks. It was reported that Englishmen resident in Australia, China, the East and West Indies, and in St. Petersburg had forwarded to the institution some contribution as tokens of their admiration of its important and philanthropic operations. During the past month life-boats had been forwarded to St. Andrew's, in Scotland, and the vicinity of Carmarthen Bay. The Admiralty presented to the institution a valuable series of charts of the coasts of the British Isles, on which are marked the life-boat and rocket stations. It was stated that the Royal Victoria Yacht Club had decided to present the cost (£380) of a life-boat station on the Isle of Wight to the society. The late Mr. Edwin Cuthbert had left the society a liberal legacy of £50. Admiral Sir Thomas Herbert, K.C.B., and Sir Edward Perrott, Bart., were elected vice-presidents of the institution. For the past nine years Sir Edward Perrott had been most zealous and active in aiding to carry on the important work of the Life-boat Society. A letter was read from "S. G. O." the well-known correspondent of the Times, expressing his approval of the mode of management and system of accounts of the Life-boat Institution, and forwarding a liberal donation in aid of its funds. Payments amounting to £660 on various life-boat establishments having been made, the proceedings closed.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—A special general meeting of this Society was held on Tuesday at the house of the Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi—the Rev. L. T. Harcourt, V.P., in the chair—when the following members of the Royal family were elected Fellows:—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, Prince Alfred, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, Princess Beatrice, Princess Frederick William of Prussia, the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Cambridge, and Princess Mary. Amongst the other candidates elected were:—The Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury, Colonel H. Baillie, Lord and Lady Cochrane, Sir William and Lady Cubitt, Earl and Countess of Ellesmere, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Earl and Countess Granville, G. Granville Leveson Gower, Esq., Right Hon. Robert Lowe, M.P., Hon. Francis Maude, Sir Roderick I. Murchison, the Duke of Newcastle, Titus Salt, Esq., M.P., Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, Sir Thomas Troubridge, Bart., Professor Westmacott, and upwards of one hundred other ladies and gentlemen. It was announced that another special general meeting for the election of various candidates would take place on Tuesday, Feb. 28.

ROYAL MATERNITY SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this institution was held on Thursday at its new establishment, Chatham-place, Blackfriars—Dr. Langstaff in the chair. From the report read by Mr. Seabrook, the sub-secretary, it appeared that the number of poor married women who had been delivered at their own homes during the year amounts to 3749, leaving an increase of 112 over those of the preceding year, and making a total of 396,359 deliveries since the foundation of the charity in 1759. The number of children delivered this year was 3780, of which 2021 were males and 1759 were females. Amongst the births were 31 cases of twins, and 1 of triplets. The stillbirths were 123, and 14 were of so serious a character that they ended fatally. Of these 11, or about 1 in 340 of the entire number, of deliveries arose from causes immediately connected with childbirth, while three had no direct bearing on that process. The report having been received and adopted, Dr. J. Braxton Hicks, of Wellington-street, London-bridge, was elected to fill the vacancy in the medical staff of the society caused by the premature decease of Dr. Samuel Griffith. The receipts of the year, from subscriptions and other sources, amounted to £2131 18s. 1d. This amount was entirely expended, and a balance of £134 10s. 9d. remains due to the treasurer, in addition to the sum of £300 advanced by him to enable the committee to purchase the lease of the present charity house.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—The rioting in the parish church of St. George-in-the-East became more violent on Sunday evening than it had ever been before. The morning and afternoon services were unattended by any marked outburst of popular hostility; but in the evening the scene was one most disgusting. 3000 persons crowded the building, and of these about 1000 were boys, who took possession of the galleries. These lads at once began cockcrowing, yelling, and hissing; and amid the confusion might be heard snatches of ribald songs. Several attempts were made to put out the gas, and caps and hats were thrown into the body of the church. The service was, of course, a dumb show, so loud and general were the blasphemous shouts with which the prayers were greeted. The sermon was preached by Mr. Lowder, but his voice was powerless against the constant interruptions and derisive jests by which he was assailed. The police were all the while stationed outside the church, but were not permitted to enter. At length, however, their interference became absolutely necessary. At the close of the service a cry was raised, "Down with the altar!" and the mob proceeded to wreak their vengeance on this obnoxious feature of the church. The altar was, however, saved by the energetic conduct of a chorister, and then was commenced an attack upon other ornaments of the edifice. The police now made their appearance, and, after battling with the mob for about an hour, succeeded in driving them into the streets. Much of the church property was destroyed. It was even proposed to attack the Rector's house, but the rioters were frustrated in this design. This painful outrage was on Monday night alluded to in both Houses of Parliament, and it was announced by Sir G. C. Lewis that steps would be taken to prevent its repetition.

THE METROPOLITAN UNDERGROUND RAILWAY.—This scheme, which has been for so many years before the public, is at length in course of being carried into effect. Shafts are being sunk at several places along the line of the proposed railway. One has been opened on the unoccupied piece of land at King's-cross, near the railway station, and another near Euston-square. When a sufficient depth has been reached the excavators will commence tunneling in the direction of the London and North-Western Railway station, with which a junction will be effected a short distance from the present terminus. At King's-cross a junction will also be made with the railway near the first bridge which crosses Maiden-lane. These side branches will at the point of junction be on the level with the railways with which they communicate, but they will join the main or trunk line beneath the New-road, the gradients rising gradually from twenty-five feet below the thoroughfare to the rails of the London and North-western and the other line. At the Paddington station a commencement has been made, and here, as in the junction with the northern lines of railway, the communication will be above ground. The whole distance between Paddington and the Bagnigge-wells-road will be tunneled, but at this latter point the line will run on a level, or in an open cutting, as the nature of the ground may require. As at present arranged, the line will have its City terminus in the new Victoria-street. But it is probable that before the line is completed powers will be obtained by the Corporation of London which will give to the railway the power of diverting a portion of the line to Smithfield, and providing it with a goods station in connection with the proposed dead-meat markets to be constructed there by the city of London. The underground railway will be provided at one or two places along the line, probably at those spots where the shafts are now being sunk, with ventilating shafts. But it is considered that there will not be any great necessity for providing ventilating shafts, as the numerous stations along the line and the open cuttings at each end will provide sufficient currents of air for the purpose. The railway will be provided with two lines of rails, but they will be on the mixed gauge, and available for the carriage of the broad as well as of the narrow gauge, and the heavy goods traffic will be carried on during the night. The passenger-carriages will be lighted with portable gas, and everything will be done to make a journey twenty-five feet below the surface of the ground as pleasant and as comfortable as possible. About two years will be occupied in making the line.

HEAVY GALE AND GREAT LOSS OF SHIPPING.—The accounts received last Saturday at Lloyd's from various ports on the coast speak of a very heavy gale, ranging from the S.W. to the N.E., accompanied in the more northern districts by snow, having swept the coast on Thursday night and Friday morning. The result of its fury is too sadly told in a long list of casualties which have come to hand. In several instances there has been a serious loss of life, in addition to a considerable destruction of property.

A subscription for raising a monument in Nice to Marshal Massena has just been published. The Emperor of the French gives 1000f., and all the Marshals of France will, it is believed, take part in the subscription.

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.—The Pluto, one of our cruisers on the west coast of Africa, has captured the Orion, one of the most notorious of the American slavers. The Orion had a cargo of 888 slaves, and this number, according to a letter written by one of the Pluto's crew, will make an aggregate of 2080 negroes who have, in less than two months, been rescued from the grasp of the slave-dealers.

COLONEL WAUGH.—A "Creditor of the London and Eastern Bank" writes to the Times to say that the distinguished Colonel named above "is residing in a handsome house, No. 3, Rue Balsac, Paris, at a corner of the Rue Lord Byron, formerly the residence of Mr. Lawrence Peel, and situate in one of the most fashionable and healthy quartiers of this brilliant city. As I passed the Colonel's mansion the other day I saw through an open window his domestics spreading 'the social board.' This little incident leads me to the conclusion that the ex-lord of Branksea Castle is still in very comfortable, if not affluent, circumstances." The letter is signed "A Creditor of the London and Eastern Bank, living au quatrième, and eating four-franc dinners."

SNOWBALL RIOT IN EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh papers contain long accounts of a "snowball riot" which took place between the students of the university of that city and the police. From ten in the morning till four in the afternoon the battle raged with varying success, and about equal damage to each party. The skirmish at last grew to a threatening height, for many of the students had armed themselves with bludgeons, and the authorities of the university appeared on the scene. At their request the police withdrew, and the tumult shortly afterwards ceased.

PROPOSED RAILWAY ACROSS THE ANDES.—At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society last week—Sir Roderick Murchison in the chair—Dr. Shaw read a paper on the proposed railway across the Andes, from Caldera viâ Cordova to Rosario, on the Plata. The author was Mr. Wheelwright, an engineer, who has for some years been engaged in constructing railways in Chili. He is of opinion that the Caldera and Rosario Railway, though difficult, is not impracticable. It would open up the South American States to commerce, and place England within fifty days of Australia. Admiral Fitzroy said he believed the railway to be practicable.

The Hungarians had their "national" ball at Pesth on the 19th ult., and a very brilliant affair it is said to have been. All the gentlemen wore attilas (the national embroidered frock-coat is so called) of black or dark blue cloth, and the ladies were dressed in coloured silk bodices, with white silk or gauze skirts. As a matter of course, the fair Magyar dames wore the parta, which is one of the prettiest and most becoming of headdresses. In general it consists of a little cap of red or black velvet, to which are attached broad ribbond, embroidered with gold and silver, that fall over the shoulders; but sometimes the parta is a diadem of precious stones with pendent ribbons. The national costume of the Hungarian ladies is not complete without the mente, a little pelisse, which is attached to the shoulder. The mente of the young women is of white silk or cashmere, embroidered with gold and silver, and with a small edging of swansdown, but that of the elder ladies is of velvet and rich furs, with antiquated buttons of gold and turquoises.

MR. G. F. WATTS' FRESCO.*

ANOTHER dash at fresco! and upon a larger scale than anything of the kind yet attempted in this country. It cannot, at any rate, be said that our artists are idle, or wanting in ambition to fill the highest walks in art, and re-establish art amongst us upon the scale worthy of a great people in an intellectual age. If we do not succeed to the utmost of our wish it is not for want of trying.

Mr. G. F. Watts, who distinguished himself creditably in the first Government competition in connection with the re-building of the new Houses of Parliament, failing to receive patronage and encouragement in high quarters for the heroic in art, which he would aspire to, has come forward, gratuitously, we understand, to decorate the upper part of the north wall of Lincoln's-inn Hall with a grand fresco representing the early lawgivers from Moses down to Edward I., which self-imposed task he has just completed, and in a manner to redound much to his honour, and to offer encouragement, as we think, to those who would labour with him in the same lofty field. The dimensions of this work are about 45 feet wide by 40 feet high in the centre. In its arrangement, as will be at once apparent, this fresco follows the model of Raphael's celebrated "School of Athens" in the Vatican at Rome (and a fine copy of which, by-the-by, is in Northumberland House), the figures being arranged in three main lines, upon steps with landings. But it must be admitted — and this we say without any desire to detract from the real merits of the performance — that it is in little else than the arrangement that Mr. Watts can be said to follow his great prototype, inasmuch that the very fact of the imitation is in some respect detrimental, by suggesting comparisons which can hardly be otherwise than damaging. It is well to look these matters fairly in the face, and Mr. Watts may take the stringency of any remarks we may make as a compliment, rather than otherwise; for none but a great and important work is, in our opinion, worthy of a strict and searching criticism: none other can stand it.

Recurring to our comparison with Raphael, we have to remark that the latter was fortunate in having a far better subject than that to which Mr. Watts has had to address himself. "The School of Athens," embracing every branch of philosophy and mental development, presents opportunities for great variety of character and action, which the simple presentment of successive lawgivers of different ages and countries is not susceptible of: witness at starting the contrast between speculative and practical philosophy, as indicated in the uplifted hand of Plato, and that of Aristotle pointing to the earth, as the source of all things physical: witness, also, Diogenes the Cynic, sitting aloof from all, and avoided by all: witness, too, the various groups collected around Socrates, Pythagoras, and Archimedes, each actively expounding his doctrines, all being in distinct branches of acquirement. There are no opportunities of this sort in the subject selected by Mr. Watts, and the individuality of his figures chiefly depends upon their costume or some acknowledged accessory. And yet, with all these drawbacks and disadvantages, the artist has produced a work of undeniable merit, displaying considerable invention, and great power and technic excellence in the execution.

FRESCO PAINTING, "THE SCHOOL OF LEGISLATION," BY G. F. WATTS IN LINCOLN'S-INN HALL.

* KEY TO THE FRESCO. The sitting figure in the foreground is Edw. I. On the same line with him, at the right-hand corner, are the Earls of Pembroke and Salisbury, who obtained Magna Charta; and Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury. The second row of figures consists of an ancient Druid; Ina, King of the West Saxons; Alfred the Great; Attila; Charlemagne; two Scribes of Justinian transcribing the Code and Pandects; Justinian and Theodora; a Monk receiving the Laws; a Churchman delivering them to the barbarians; Mahomet; and two figures representing the northern nations of Europe. On the upper line are Servius Tullus; Numa Pompilius; Solon; Draco; Minos; Lycurgus; Moses; Sesostris; Zoroaster; Pythagoras; Confucius; and Menu. The top group represents Justice, Religion, and Mercy.

To proceed now to a description of the design, which is of an arched form, to suit the locality in which it is placed. In the very apex the artist has represented a window in Perpendicular Gothic, which, however appropriate to the architecture of the structure, and however acceptable it might be if real, we must consider pictorially an error, the more particularly as the darkness of this upper region of the building is such as to make any suggestion of a window almost amount to a mockery; and without pictorial object its introduction suggests want of resource and the necessity of filling up an awkward waste space. Beneath this window, or rather projected against the lower part of it, is a group of three figures—Religion, Mercy, and Justice—which the artist would indicate as the moral attributes of Legislation, though how far justly so as respects the second we are by no means satisfied of. Beneath these ideal creations is the first row of lawgivers, prominent amongst whom is Moses, looking up to heaven, and grasping the Tables of the Ten Commandments, the first revealed code for the guidance of man. On each side of this central figure sit, as in solemn conclave, the great Pagan legislators—the resolute Lycurgus, the merciless Draco, the milder Solon, the mythic Minos, the Romans Numa and Servius Tullius being to the right of Moses; whilst the Asiatic and African races are represented on his left by Sesostris, who takes place, not as a conqueror, but as an exponent of Egyptian law; by Zoroaster, the Persian; Confucius, the Chinese; and Menu, the Hindoo lawgiver. On the fifth step below the Hebrew legislator stands Justinian, as representing the great historic link between the Pagan and Christian eras. Beside him, and leaning on his shoulder, is his wife, the Empress Theodora, the only female figure in the composition, and the introduction of which is of somewhat questionable propriety, unless it be intended to suggest the ascendancy of the tenderer feelings over the rigorous purpose of the lawgiver, as tempering justice with mercy. Below Justinian is a group of Scribes, with the Pandects, the Code, and the Institutes; and near them a Jurisconsult and a Doctor of the Church, who distribute the laws of the empire to the barbarous peoples of the north, the Lombard, the Goth, the Frank, and the Briton. Charlemagne, the Frankish Emperor, with sword and crown, stands alone, a prominent figure; behind him are our own Alfred, and the lesser luminary, Ina, King of the West Saxons; and beyond, the figure of a Druid carries us back to the days of the early Briton. Attila, "the Scourge of God," distinguishable by his swarthy complexion, reclines backward from the last group. The right-hand corner of the picture is occupied by the representatives of the Magna Charta Barons, the Earls of Pembroke and Salisbury; while their companion, Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, stands forward to represent the rights of the Church as against the tyranny of absolutism, and as a co-ordinate power in legislation. In the left-hand corner, seated alone, is the figure of Edward I., "the English Justinian," whose identity is intended to be marked by the fact of his stanching the blood flowing from his poisoned arm with his ermine robe.

We have already remarked that from the very nature of the subject of this fresco there was little opportunity afforded for action or even for grouping. The distribution of the Code and Pandects of Justinian, in the second row, is the only incident in the whole composition which brings any two personages into relation with one another, and is in itself hardly of a nature to realise our notion of "action." The consequence of this defect is that the figures are almost purposeless, and their attitudes, being altogether a matter of option with the artist, bear evidence of laborious study for the mere sake of "effect," in the fancied necessity of producing some variety of aspect amongst them. Some of the figures on the upper row bear a distinct impress of having been studied after Michael Angelo; whilst on the second row are passages which bespeak more the inspiration of Raphael. The purely original figures are not the most successful; and, least of all, those of the prelate and barons, and of Edward I., on the lowest step. The choice of the action in the last-named figure is unfortunate in many respects: in the first place, it is not pleasing in itself; and in the second place, it bears no relation to anything going on in the picture nor to any incident in the King's life having reference to his character as a legislator; nor, indeed, finally, has it anything to do with Edward as King, having taken place before his accession to the throne, when fighting in Palestine.

With regard to the technical execution, admitting some admirable drawing and a general breadth and treatment which indicates the presence of power and resource in the artist, we are compelled to state that in respect of colour the work is deficient—dull, crude, and obscure. Indeed, we fear we must admit that the pigments and vehicles necessary for fresco-painting, and which were employed in Italy by the great masters from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century, are as yet unknown to us; and, without them, any attempt at wall-painting, with the conditions attached to all wall-surfaces in this murky atmosphere of ours, must be comparatively failures. Fresco-painting, being seen at a distance, requires bright, pure, and, for the most part, simple colours, without graduated or mixed tints—the distance alone serving to soften and graduate contrasting colours placed in the most abrupt contact. Above all, a good light should be vouchsafed to the picture, which in the case of the upper regions of the Gothic hall of Lincoln's-inn is a matter of simple impossibility, insomuch that the want of air which is complained of in the picture is, in our opinion, owing to the unfortunate circumstances under which it is seen. This disadvantage, we may add, is almost inseparable from Gothic architecture, which is unfavourable to the display of mural painting, except as employed for mere decorative purposes; and upon this ground we must deprecate the fashion, now so rife, of rushing into Gothic on all occasions of building a public edifice. Not to go to other examples, the grand defect in the new Houses of Parliament, and which is obvious throughout the building, with the exception perhaps of the actual chambers of the Legislature (which themselves are not Gothic), is want of light—a want which has all but extinguished many of the mural decorations in spite of an extravagant application of colour by the artist in a desperate effort to make his work seen.

In conclusion, let us say that, notwithstanding some shortcomings and many disadvantages under which it is viewed, Mr. Watts's fresco must be accepted with thanks, as one of the most important that has been attempted in our age or country—one highly creditable to his zeal and talent, and to his public spirit also, and of which the learned body whose edifice it graces may well be proud.

Dr. Todd, F.R.S., died suddenly on Monday.

The visitors at the South Kensington Museum last week numbered 12,536. On Monday, Tuesday, and Saturday (free days) there were 5469; on Monday and Tuesday (free evenings), 5196; on the three students' days (admission to the public, sixpence), 1253; one students' evening (Wednesday), 641.

The address of the Roman Catholics which was forwarded to Lord Palmerston yesterday week, bore the signatures of eight Peers, four sons of Peers, three Privy Councillors, seven Baronets, eighteen members of Parliament, and 295 Deputy-Lieutenants, justices of the peace, landed proprietors, &c.

Mr. Cobden and the Emperor Napoleon.—The Paris Correspondent of the Augsburg Gazette writes:—"I gather from one of the managers of the Chemin du Nord that when Mr. Cobden arrived some months ago from England his luggage weighed about 13,000 kilogrammes (?), that is to say thirteen tons. [This account, there is little doubt, contains a cipher, if not two ciphers, in excess.] It was immediately forwarded to St. Cloud. This parcel contained patterns of every kind of English produce. The Emperor went with Mr. Cobden over the whole of these articles, comparing quality, cost of production, and price with that of the corresponding articles of French manufacture. At that time nobody in Paris had an idea that Mr. Cobden had established a dépôt of English goods in the Palace of St. Cloud, and was studying economical reform with the Emperor, as he once before had done with Sir Robert Peel. The Emperor made a good use of this opportunity to acquire commercial knowledge, and he thus became enabled to meet and conquer the deputations of the Protectionists on their own ground." The Memorial de Lisle, however, says that at the audiences which the Emperor, indeed, seems to have granted to some of these deputations he contented himself with attentively listening to their spokesmen, and made no reply whatsoever.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

[The accompanying report of the proceedings in both Houses of Parliament yesterday se'nnight appeared in our town edition last week.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, Jan. 27.

Endowed Schools.—Lord Cranworth obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to endowed schools.

Religious Services in the Metropolitan Theatres.—Lord Dungannon gave notice that, on an early day, he intended to call attention to the improper use of the metropolitan theatres for the purposes of religious worship on the Sabbath.

Indian Prize-money.—The Earl of Ellenborough asked whether any measure had as yet been adopted with a view to the distribution of the property captured by the army in India during the war of the mutiny, and upon what principles such distribution, if intended, was to be made?—The Duke of Argyll said the Indian Government had not been as yet enabled to compute the value of the property captured at Delhi and in other parts of India; but the information was expected by every mail, and, as soon as it was complete, a full statement would be made on the subject to the House.

Importation of Cotton.—Lord Brougham moved for a return of the quantities of cotton imported from the various ports of the world within the last two years, ending the 31st of December, 1859, distinguishing the several countries from which imported, and also the amount of revenue levied on the same. The noble Lord stated that there were no less than four hundred and eighty articles on which duties and excise were levied, to the great injury of those engaged in trade, and without any benefit commensurate to the injury, annoyance, and vexation created. The whole amount of revenne derived from those four hundred and eighty articles did not exceed £700,000, and he hoped soon to see an end put to such a source of revenue. The imposition of duties upon cotton was especially unwise, as the raw material formed one of the most important articles of our manufactures, and the abolition of the duties would not only give an additional impetus to our home industry, but, by encouraging the growth of cotton in Africa, would tend materially to discourage slave labour.—The Duke of Newcastle said there was no objection to produce the returns moved for. The attention of the Government would be carefully directed to the encouragement of the growth of cotton in our own colonies.—After a few words from the Bishop of Oxford and Lord Overstone, Lord Wodehouse admitted the importance of the question, and said that favourable accounts had been received from Dr. Livingstone and an exploring expedition on the Niger as to the capabilities of Africa as a cotton-producing country. He was sorry, however, to say, from information he had received that the slave trade had lately increased, notwithstanding the efforts which had been made to suppress it.—After some further conversation the subject dropped.

France and Sardinia.—The Marquis of Normanby inquired of her Majesty's Government whether they had received any information as to the negotiation stated by the Ministerial journals in Paris to exist between France and Sardinia for the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the country of Nice to the dominions of the French?—Earl Granville said that the Government had received no such information as that alluded to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, Jan. 27.

Law of Bankruptcy.—Transfer of Land.—The Attorney-General gave notice of his intention, on Friday, the 3rd of February, to introduce a bill to amend and consolidate the laws regarding bankruptcy and insolvency in England. And, on the 17th, to introduce a bill to amend the law relating to the transfer of real estate and the title thereto.

Newspapers for Australia.—In reply to Lord A. Churchill, Mr. Laing said it was not the intention of her Majesty's Government to make any alteration in the additional penny placed by the late Government on the postage of newspapers viâ Southampton and Suez to the Australian colonies. The additional penny brought in about £5000 a year.

Accidents on Railways.—Mr M. Gibson, in answer to a question from Mr. Bentinck, said there was no intention on the part of the Government to introduce any measure in relation to accidents on railways.

Indian Prize-money.—Sir C. Wood, in reply to Mr. Turner, said that steps were about to be taken for the distribution of prize-money for the capture of Lucknow, but that more information was required from India before similar steps could be taken with regard to the distribution of the Delhi prize-money.

Central Italy.—Mr. D. Griffith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it was true, as stated in a French paper, that 30,000 French troops were expected at Leghorn, and whether he had reason to believe that the French Government had any intention of taking any such step for the purpose of preventing the annexation of the provinces of Central Italy to Sardinia, which their constitutional representatives had voted as their final determination?—Lord J. Russell said he did not believe there was the slightest truth in the statement referred to.

The Case of Smethurst.—Mr. E. James called attention to the case of Dr. Smethurst, and inquired whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure to give the right of appeal to persons convicted of capital and other crimes, which he contended ought to be given?—Sir G. C. Lewis said there was a bill already before the House for giving an appeal in criminal cases, upon which he would be prepared to express his sentiments when it came to a second reading. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to justify the course he had taken in regard to Dr. Smethurst, and said that he had acted upon the best legal and medical advice he could obtain.

Cruelties to Seamen in American Vessels.—Mr. M. Milnes asked Lord J. Russell what measures had been adopted with regard to the Address presented to her Majesty on the 2nd of August, 1859, by the House, praying her Majesty to enter into negotiations with the United States for the purpose of preventing the assaults and cruelties committed on merchant seamen in American vessels, and called attention to some recent occurrences of that nature the details of which have been already generally published?—Lord J. Russell said negotiations were in progress between the two Governments which he hoped would shortly result in measures to meet the evil so loudly and so generally complained of.

The Divorce Court.—Mr. Bovill inquired whether it was intended to propose any alteration in the constitution of the Courts of Probate and Divorce, so as to facilitate the course of business and relieve the Judges of the common law courts from the necessity of assisting the Judge of the Divorce Court?—Sir G. C. Lewis said the subject had been under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, but her Majesty's Government were not prepared to recommend the creation of new Judges but he thought it might be possible to facilitate business in the Divorce Court by enabling a single Judge to dispose of cases there.

Savings Banks.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained leave to bring in a bill founded upon his resolution of the previous night.

Highways.—Sir G. C. Lewis obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better management of highways in England and Wales.

Municipal Property.—Sir G. C. Lewis also obtained leave to bring in a bill to make public provision concerning mortgages and other dispositions of property belonging to municipal corporations in England and Ireland.

Indian Bonds, &c.—Sir C. Wood obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate probate and administration with respect to certain Indian Government securities, to repeal certain stamp duties, and to extend the operation of the Act of the 22nd and 23rd Vic., c. 39, to India Bonds.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

Several bills introduced by the Lord Chancellor for the consolidation and amendment of the statute and criminal law were read a first time.

Lord St. Leonards' Law of Property Bill attained its second reading.

The Duke of Marlborough moved the reappointment of the Select Committee on church rates.

Earl Granville, in answer to a question on the subject by the Bishop of London, stated that the Government considered it their duty to take steps for preventing the recurrence of such scenes as were witnessed in St. George's-in-the-East on the previous night.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

Spain and Morocco.—Mr. Maguire gave notice of an important question about the conduct of Mr. Drummond Hay, who is reported to have violated the neutrality he should maintain, as a British Consul, in respect to the war between Spain and Morocco.

Gloucester and Wakefield Elections.—In reply to Mr. Hadfield, the Home Secretary stated that 200 of the witnesses examined before the Gloucester Commission had applied for certificates, which had been granted in all but three cases; and that at Wakefield 102 witnesses had been indemnified.

Savoy and Nice.—Mr. Disraeli asked if certain papers relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France could be produced, to which Lord John Russell replied that he was not sure it would be prudent to print them at present.

Church of St. George-in-the-East.—The disturbances at this church were again brought before the House by Mr. Butler and Mr. Danby Seymour, who were followed by Mr. Hadfield. Sir G. C. Lewis made a reply to the same effect as that given in the House of Lords by Earl Granville as to the intention of Government to adopt measures for preventing the repetition of such disgraceful riots as were witnessed on Sunday evening. Sir G. C. Lewis said that Sir R. Mayne had had that morning an interview with the Rev. Bryan King, and it had been arranged to send an ample body of police to the church next Sunday.

The New Commercial Relations with France.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that the financial statement of the Government would be made on Monday next, when he hoped to be able to produce the commercial treaty with France. He was anxious, however, to obviate any inconvenience which might arise from uncertainty as to the provisions of the treaty, and he would, therefore, on Thursday, ask the House to consider the proposals which he had to make in connection with this new Anglo-French alliance.

The Edinburgh Annuity Tax came on for consideration in the shape of a motion of the Lord Advocate for the introduction of a bill. The learned Lord proposes the abolition of the tax, but he wants an assessment laid on for fifteen years before it is done.

London Corporation.—Sir G. C. Lewis introduced a measure for the reform of the Corporation of London. The right hon. gentleman gave the House to understand that, while it was founded upon the measure of last Session, as amended by a Select Committee, it would not deal with such questions as the coal and metage duties.—Mr. Ayrton objected to such compromising legislation, and particularly referred to the absurdity of our Government making arrangements for free trade in coal with the city of Paris while there was to be no free trade in coal for our own metropolis. He also referred to the old £10 franchise, which the bill supported, as inconsistent at a time when a Liberal Government had pledged themselves to an extended suffrage.—Mr. Williams, Mr. Locke, and Mr. James also urged objections.

Packet and Telegraph Contracts.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the packet and telegraph contracts, remarking, at the same time, that in the next Estimates the supervision of the postal contracts would be removed from the Admiralty to St. Martin's-le-Grand. A somewhat animated discussion arose upon this motion. On the one hand, Sir J. Pakington denounced the manner in which Mr. Cobden's Committee on this subject had been conducted; on the other hand, Mr. B. Osborne recalled the circumstances which led to the original inquiry, and characterised the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a new Committee as a mere compromise intended to make matters pleasant.—The motion was ultimately agreed to.

Some business of a routine character was also transacted.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

Fusion of Law and Equity.—The Lord Chancellor introduced a bill to enlarge the powers of courts of common law in questions of equity.

Dilapidations in Glebe-houses.—Viscount Dungannon asked whether any measure would be introduced this Session under the sanction of the Episcopal Bench to alter and amend the law relative to dilapidations in glebe-houses?—The Archbishop of Canterbury said that a bill on the subject would shortly be introduced.—The Earl of Carnarvon and the Lord Chancellor expressed a hope that the bill would be as complete as possible.

Transfer of Land.—Lord Brougham laid on the table of the House a bill for facilitating the sale and transfer of real estates and the registration of titles. The bill was read a first time, after some remarks from the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cranworth.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

Irish Education.—Mr. Hennessy inquired whether the Government intended to introduce any measure this Session respecting Irish education.—Mr. Cardwell said that no alteration would be made without first taking the opinion of Parliament.

Affairs of Sardinia.—In reply to Mr. Stansfeld, Lord J. Russell said that Sir James Hudson, her Majesty's Ambassador at Turin, had received no instructions from her Majesty's Government respecting the proposed "Nazione Armati," to be formed in Sardinia, of which General Garibaldi was to have been president. The communications between the Sardinian authorities and Sir James Hudson were entirely of a private character, and he (Lord J. Russell) was not aware that the French Ambassador had anything to do with them.

The Case of Martin Escalante.—Lord J. Russell stated, in reply to a question from Sir Andrew Agnew, that there was no evidence that the British Consul at Cadiz could have interfered to relieve a person named Martin Escalante, a British subject, who had infringed the Spanish law; but that after he had been convicted he had interfered to procure a mitigation of his punishment, and that in all probability he would soon be released.

The Militia Force.—Colonel Dickson asked the Secretary of State for War whether it was intended to embody fresh regiments of militia in the place of those about to be disembodied, and whether it was intended to introduce any measure to place the militia force on a more permanent and efficient footing?—Mr. S. Herbert replied that it was not intended to embody any regiments in lieu of those which were about to be disbanded.

The Commercial Treaty with France.—Mr. T. Duncombe inquired whether it would be competent for the House to consider and alter any of the details of the treaty with France; whether a drawback on foreign wines in stock would be allowed, or whether, following the precedent set by Mr. Canning in 1825, the reduced customs duty would not come into operation for a year, so that time might be given to persons in the trade to dispose of their stocks?—Mr. M. Gibson said the treaty would be subjected to the approval of Parliament, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would on Monday evening explain in detail the manner in which it was proposed to carry it into effect.

Merchant Shipping.—Mr. Lindsay then moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the operations of the burdens and restrictions especially affecting merchant shipping, and of the following statutes:—9 and 10 Vic., c. 93 an Act for Compensating the Families of Persons Killed by Accidents; the Merchant Shipping Act (1854); the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act (1855); the Passenger Act (1855); and the Chinese Passenger Act (1855). The hon. gentleman referred at great length to the burdens which affected the shipping interest, and contended that while we put foreign ships on a footing with our own, and allowed them to compete with us, the nations to which those ships belonged refused to extend similar privileges to us. He also complained of the heavy passing tolls levied upon ships by harbours which they never entered, and of the duties charged upon the importation of oak and pitch pine used in the construction of ships. In addition to these exactions, there were fiscal and other burdens which depressed the mercantile marine and called for the interference of Parliament. The hon. gentleman repudiated any desire to revive protection for the shipping interest, as all he asked was a clear stage and no favour.—Mr. Horsfall seconded the motion.—Mr. W. D. Seymour asked the House not to limit the inquiry to the evils of which Mr. Lindsay complained, but to give it a far wider and more comprehensive range. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving that the Select Committee be empowered to consider the expediency of giving to the High Court of Admiralty an appellative jurisdiction over naval courts and inquiries, under Part 8 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and otherwise enlarging the powers of that court in matters relating to merchant shipping.—Mr. Somes seconded the proposition of Mr. Seymour.—Mr R. W. Crawford supported the original motion.—Mr. Bentinck thought the entire question lay in a nutshell, and that the grievances of the shipping interest might be removed at once by retracting the progress Parliament had already made in the direction of free trade. He declared that free trade and a high state of civilisation were incompatible one with the other, except at the cost of national bankruptcy.—Mr. Clay, Mr. Danby Seymour, Mr. Hugh Taylor, Mr. Augustus Smith, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Cave, and Sir C. Napier having spoken, Mr. Milner Gibson, on the part of the Government, assented to the motion, and gave it as his opinion that the inquiry ought to be as wide as possible. He did not deny that the shipping interest was in a depressed condition; at the same time he did not think the House would be justified in agreeing with Mr. Digby Seymour that that depression was such as to call for the active interference of Parliament. The conclusion to which he had arrived was that the depression complained of was a fluctuation common to all trades and employments, and that it would be impossible for Parliament to secure to the shipowner an undeviating course of prosperity, or that freights could be settled at any fixed amount. Mr. Seymour's amendment was then withdrawn, and the original resolution, with some verbal alterations, was agreed to.

Corrupt Practices at Elections.—Mr. Mellor moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854, and to make further provision for the detection and prevention of bribery, treating, and undue influence at Parliamentary and municipal elections. The object of the bill was to put bribery upon the same footing as other misdemeanours, and thus bring the punishment home to those who endeavoured to tamper with the independence of electors.—Sir F. Kelly approved of the bill, but expressed his opinion that no measure that could be brought forward would have the slightest chance of success if it were not seriously and earnestly supported, if not undertaken, by her Majesty's Government.—Lord Palmerston assured the House that the Government were not indifferent to the importance of legislating on this subject, and that they would consider any measure from any quarter that might be proposed for the accomplishment of the common object. He hoped that before the Session closed some legislation might be devised to check what all admitted to be a most deplorable state of things.—After a few words from Mr. Steuart, leave was given to bring in the bill.

Election Petitions.—On the motion of Mr. Mellor, leave was also given to bring in a bill to amend the Election Petitions Act of 1848.

Public Improvements.—Mr. Slaney obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable a majority of two-thirds of the ratepayers of any parish or district duly assembled to rate their parish or district in aid of public improvements for general benefit within their district, a certain proportion being before raised by donations and subscriptions.

Warehousing Places.—The House having gone into Committee, Mr. Hadfield moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable the parishes of Manchester, and the boroughs of Liverpool, Leeds, Sheffield, and Bradford, to be appointed warehousing places.—Mr. Beecroft seconded the motion, and the Chairman brought in the bill accordingly.

Adulteration of Food.—Mr. Scholefield brought in his bill for preventing the adulteration of articles of food or drink.

Attorneys and Solicitors.—Mr. J. Locke obtained leave to bring in a bill (similar to that before the House last Session) to amend several of the laws relating to attorneys and solicitors practising in England and Wales.

The other business on the paper was then disposed of.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

Bribery at Elections.—Mr. E. James gave notice that, on the second reading of the Bill to Amend the Corrupt Practices at Elections Act and the Bill to Amend the Election Petitions Act, he should move that they be referred to a Select Committee.

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. M'Mahon moved the second reading of a bill to provide an appeal in criminal cases, his object being to remove an anomaly in the law by which every suitor in civil cases had a right of appeal, while in criminal cases the only resort was to the mercy of the Crown through the Home Secretary. He urged that there was an appeal in these cases in France and in America. What he proposed was that if after trial a person felt that he was wrongfully convicted he might move for a certiorari, give security for costs, and then be entitled to a new trial on the merits.

Mr. W. Ewart seconded the motion, fully agreeing in the principle of the bill. He advised that it should be referred to a Select Committee to settle its details.

Sir G. C. Lewis said it was not proposed to abolish the prerogative of pardon, but merely to add a step in our criminal procedure. He thought if the bill passed as it was it would have little effect, and still leave the actual appeal in criminal cases in the hands of the Home Secretary. He argued that the weight of authority was rather against than in favour of an appeal in criminal cases. The law in most civilised countries was not to grant new trials in these cases. The distinction between an appeal in civil and criminal cases was almost universal. The reason was that there was no antagonism in criminal as there was in civil cases. If there was not a great frequency of wrong convictions proved, the groundwork of this measure failed, and he thought there was no such evidence before the House. The case of Smethurst was not one on which an argument for a criminal appeal could be founded; there was no misdirection to the jury, nor such a failure of evidence as would have ensured a new trial; the decision of the Home Office was founded, not on legal grounds, but on considerations connected with the imperfections of medical science in reference to poisons. One effect of the bill would be to introduce delay and uncertainty into the administration of the criminal law. It would be useless and nugatory to provide an appeal, and yet not provide a prisoner with the means of prosecuting it. The right of appeal ought to hold good in the case of the prosecutor as well as in that of the prisoner, if it was intended to assimilate civil and criminal procedure. He thought no argument had been adduced to justify a departure from the principle, that as a verdict was conclusive against a prosecutor, so it should be conclusive against a prisoner. The prerogative of the Crown as exercised by the Home Office was only exercised on the side of mercy and not on that of aggravation; while the appeal was direct, rapid, unencumbered with official forms, and was cheap and utterly without cost. He moved the rejection of the bill.

Mr. G. Denman, though opposed to this bill, was of opinion that a case had been made out for a full consideration of the question.

Mr. Phillips also opposed the bill.

Mr. E. James, while willing to sanction the principle of an appeal in criminal cases, could not give his assent to the present measure, the machinery of which would prove quite inefficacious.

Mr. George and Mr. Mellor opposed the bill.

Mr. Henley wished to guard himself against its being supposed that he was unfavourable to an amendment of the law in this matter, by his opposition to, and voting against, this bill, which had rather increased than diminished the difficulties by which the question was surrounded.

The Solicitor-General and Mr. Digby Seymour also opposed the bill—the latter urging on the Government the consideration of the question.

Mr. Longfield, though not wholly approving of the bill, would vote for the second reading.

Mr. M'Mahon having replied,

The motion for the second reading was negatived without a division.

Qualification for Offices.—Mr. Hadfield moved the second reading of the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill.—Lord Lovaine opposed its being read a second time without discussion.—Sir G. C. Lewis supported the bill.—Mr. Newdegate moved the adjournment of the debate, which was agreed to.

Committee of Supply.—The House having gone into a Committee of Supply, Mr. Laing moved that a sum, not exceeding £13,230,000, be granted to her Majesty to pay off and discharge Exchequer Bills charged in the aids of 1860, unprovided for, which was agreed to.

The St. Mary-in-Rydal Marriages Validity Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

Private Bills.—On the motion of Lord Redesdale, the following resolution was agreed to:—"That no bill originating in the House, and included in either of the two classes of private bills in standing order No. 178, be read a second time after Tuesday, the 14th day of February, except with special leave of the House."

Law of Property Bill.—Lord St. Leonards, in moving the Committee upon this bill, stated that it was similar to the object of the measure he introduced last Session, which was to simplify the law in regard to property. After some discussion the bill passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

New Member.—Mr. Childers took the oaths and his seat for the borough of Pontefract.

Relations with China.—Mr. B. Cochrane gave notice that on Friday, the 17th of February, he would call attention to the subject of our relations with China.

Annexation of Savoy to France.—Lord J. Russell, in reply to Mr. Disraeli, said that the Government had considered the question respecting the production of the papers relating to the reported intended annexation of Savoy to France, and had come to the conclusion that it would not be convenient to produce those documents. He would, however, state their substance. When the rumour first came to the ears of her Majesty's Government, in July last, that such an annexation was intended, they endeavoured, through Count Walewski, to ascertain the facts. In the first conversation which took place between Lord Cowley and Count Walewski the latter was not very explicit; but in a subsequent conversation he stated that there was no intention on the part of the Emperor of the French of proposing such an annexation. On the first occasion it was stated to Count Walewski that the report was received with great dissatisfaction by her Majesty's Government (cheers); and on the second occasion her Majesty's Government immediately intimated to Count Walewski that they had received his statement with much satisfaction (Cheers).

Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure, &c.—Mr. Wise moved, "That in the opinion of this House it would be desirable to appoint every year a Select Committee to inquire into the Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure of the preceding year; into the payments made out of the Consolidated Fund; and into those on account of the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues." The hon. member contended that the appointment of such a Committee would effect great savings in the expenditure for the public service, upon which, under the present system, there was no sufficient check. Mr. A. Smith seconded the motion.—Mr. Laing admitted the importance of the subject, and that great advantages might arise from the institution of a standing Finance Committee to inquire into the Civil Service Estimates. It would certainly relieve the Government of a great responsibility, but it was for the House to determine whether it was not better that the responsibility of framing those estimates should continue to rest with the Government. He suggested the withdrawal of the motion; at the same time assuring the hon. gentleman that her Majesty's Government would have a due regard to economy in the expenditure which they proposed to the House.—Mr. Baxter supported the motion.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer argued that the House, in sanctioning successive increases of the public expenditure, had only acted as exponents of the public mind; and that until the public demanded the adoption of a most rigid economy it was not likely that Parliament would enforce it. One of the heads under which the greatest increase had taken place was that of public education, which was fast advancing to £2,000,000, and which, without doubt, unless a check were at once applied, would advance to £3,000,000 in no very long time. He thought the adoption of the motion would be useless, since it would begin by absolving the Government of its proper responsibility. In order to carry out the object of the hon. gentleman it would be necessary, instead of one Committee, to appoint at least half-a-dozen. He thought it desirable that the Civil Service Estimates should be reviewed periodically by a Select Committee, but that it would be impracticable to have a permanent Committee on the subject.—Mr. Bright contended that the appointment of such a Committee, honestly chosen every Session, would be a check upon the Government in the public expenditure. It would be a good answer for the Government, when applied to by particular classes for the expenditure of more money, to say they could not grant it because the Committee would not sanction it.—Sir H. Willoughby supported the motion.—Upon a division the resolution was carried by a majority of 28—the numbers being 121 in favour and 93 against it.

Bribery at Beverley.—Mr. Cobbett moved that the Attorney-General be directed to prosecute Daniel Boyse and Robert Taylor, who had been found guilty of bribery by the Committee of Inquiry into the Beverley election, pursuant to the recommendation of that Committee.—Mr. Digby Seymour moved an amendment to the effect that, as other persons had been guilty of the same offence at the same election, it was not expedient to limit the prosecution to those two individuals. He could not understand why the offending parties on the Liberal side alone should be prosecuted, and those on the Conservative side permitted to go free.—Mr. Selwyn defended the recommendation of the Committee.—Mr. Collier said, if no prosecution were entered on in the present case, there could be no force in the existing law.—Sir G. Lewis condemned the amendment as an interference with the proper course of law, which ought to be enforced in the present case.—After some further discussion the amendment was withdrawn, and the original proposition agreed to.

French Academy of Sciences.—At the commencement of the sitting the secretary announced the death of Professor Hausmann, of Gottingen, a correspondent of the Academy, at the age of seventy-eight—A communication was received from M. Cavaillé-Coll on certain experiments of his on organ pipes, and the dimensions to be given to them according to the sound to be produced. The principles he deduces from his experiments are the following:—1. The length of the pipe should be equal to the quotient of the velocity of the sound by the number of vibrations, diminished by twice the depth; 2. The number of vibrations is equal to the quotient of the velocity divided by the length of the pipe, plus the depth; 3. The depth is equal to half the quotient of the velocity of the sound by the number of vibrations, minus the length of the pipe; 4. The velocity of the sound is equal to the product of the number of vibrations into the sum of the length and twice the depth.—The Minister of War sent the Academy a copy of the account of the operations of the artillery at the siege of Sebastopol, printed by order of the War Department.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

The coming estimates of the Exchequer of England—what are they to include? A vote for Captain Harrison's monument, or a vote for what? Of course there will be a "Miscellaneous vote" for the completion of "The Nelson monument in Trafalgar-square." Until we finish Lord Nelson's Trafalgar-square memorial, let us cease from soliciting subscriptions for tidal heroes new to us, and who should deservedly be left to the reward of a coming generation. In the meantime open your purses and sympathies, and subscribe—at once—to the Harrison Fund.

To turn from one pertinent (or impertinent) subject to another. Who has not heard of Douglas Jerrold? Who has not heard of his accomplished son, Mr. Blanchard Jerrold? Reader—exuse us and imitate our example.—we stood in Mr. Douglas Thompson's class last week at the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Jerrold, not unskilled in elocution, went into the "rifle corps" of elocution, and did his work well, learning much—not from ourselves, but from Mr. Douglas Thompson. Without an "advertisement," join at once Mr. Thompson's class. Above all, attend Mr. Jerrold's forthcoming lectures on "The Employer and the Employed." Mr. Jerrold—very able with the pen — acquired his elocution (the power of reaching the ears of many) through the assistance of Mr. Thompson. We ourselves have profited by Mr. Thompson's skill; and it would be well if our clergy would avail themselves of Mr. Thompson's assistance. The art of speaking well is a study shamefully neglected. In many of our first-class schools, public and private, we find youths who write Greek and Latin verses fit for Ascham or Busby, but who have not the art of speaking—properly.

There has been a frightful pulsation in Art—and on what point? The election, on Tuesday, of two Associates to the forlorn twenty of the Royal Academy of Arts in England. Who are to be elected? Will the forty favoured run contrary to public opinion and elect the two who give good dinners (not bad things) and pass by the two—skilled in drawing and in colours, though poor—who understand their art, and make it every way intelligible to the refined and to the unrefined? We care not.

We seldom refer to contemporaries; in literature there is a graceful non-recognition of fellow-writers for the press. We are the Great Unknown; but We will not pass by three or four excellent articles in the Athenæum of last month upon Lord Chancellor Bacon. They are written—why should we conceal his name?—by the editor, Mr. Hepworth Dixon; and, in spite of their flavour of Macaulay taint and manner, are trustworthy and new.

It was said by a wit the other day—we dare not mention his name—that "the sole ambition of an author of the present day is to have a magazine of his own." What Nelson wanted, a gazette, and did not get, authors are now obtaining without any kind of difficulty.

We seldom travel into praise. But we are happy to think that Mr. Phelps, that skilled actor of our fathers' school, is stepping westward, and is to have a theatre in the West—is to have the Princess'. Many hands will crack loudy together to give Mr. Phelps a warm reception. "Mr. Phelps," said a man of the Kemble and Kean school, "is a first-rate actor. Colley Cibber would have praised him in his famous 'Apology.'"

There is a little "club" in London which deserves to be known. It flourishes almost without subscriptions, but lives on wit and wine, on fun and Barclay and Perkins. It is called "The Savages"—not from the Savage made immortal by Johnson: It is not a little Garrick, but it includes within its walls many men well known in letters and art. These men are to give us a play that will not dwindle to a farce, and to give it to us before many months are over. We could tell a great deal about it, but we are on the reserve. "More anon," as Mr. George Hodder observes in one of his ablest publications.

The "O.P." row at the British Museum is at an end. Birds are to fly to Kensington, books are to remain at Bloomsbury. Owen has lost, Panizzi has won. For our own parts we would preserve the birds anywhere—the dodo included; but we must have our books accessible and omnipresent over everything, Elgin and Layard like, Banks and Livingstone like. We thank you, Mr. Gentlemen Trustees. This battle of books and birds is settled. We thank you, Mr. Panizzi Mr. Winter Jones, and Mr. Watts. We congratulate you, Sir Frederic Madden; and you, too, Mr. Bond.

FINE ARTS.

SOCIETY OF FEMALE ARTISTS.

The lady-painters of England, for the fourth annual exhibition of their works, have located themselves in the gallery of the New Society of Painters in Water Colours, which, thanks to the tasteful arrangements of the lady secretary, Mrs. Dundas Murray, has at once an attractive and businesslike air. We congratulate the members of this society upon their industry and spirit in the pursuit of an art for which, under the conditions of older art-institutions, they had few and precarious facilities. Of the three hundred and odd works now exhibited about a fifth are copies from old masters; the rest comprise every range of subject, except the highest historic, and are of various degrees of merit. In what concerns fancy and invention the fair artists show themselves well able to hold their own against the world; in tasteful selection of natural objects, as fruit, flowers, and glimpses of landscape and domestic life, they sometimes have the advantage of their male compeers; but, with the exception of a few names, here the commendation must end. Judging from the works placed before us on the present occasion, the female painters of England have yet much to learn in the technicalities of art, as in the mixing of colours, the use of vehicles, the mysteries of chiaroscuro and aerial effect, and all those graces of treatment upon which the highest charm of the pictorial art depends. It may seem very ungallant in us to say all this; but we must speak the truth, or be silent; and, having given expression to this general remark, it may, perhaps, serve as an excuse for our not going through the exhibition to the extent we otherwise should have done to notice matters in detail.

There are, however, some works in the collection of unquestionable merit, perhaps in a sufficient amount to redeem the sisterhood as a body from the sweeping imputations of mediocrity implied in the above remarks. Mrs. Elizabeth Murray, of Teneriffe, has five pieces, of different sizes and treatment, which all, spite of a little carelessness of handling here and there, serve to maintain the high reputation she has already acquired. The principal of these is one entitled "Adoration and Admiration," an original and somewhat daring subject, representing a very pretty young damsel at her devotions before the crucifix, whilst the priest for an instant looks upon her, to admire. "The Island Beauty, Gregoria Carilla," is a striking study of a fine creole female head. "Just Awake! the Picture of My Boy," is another portrait subject, boldly treated; but, for a youth reclining on his couch and just emerging from sleep, it is too staring, and wants the appearance of repose. Mrs. Margaret Robinson shows the teaching and the style of one of the finest draughtsmen of the day in her scene from "The Vicar of Wakefield," "Olivia and Sophia in their Sunday Finery;" and in a rustic group, "Strawtwisting in the Highlands;" but the colour in both is, unfortunately, hard and opaque. Mrs. Lee Bridell (late Miss E. Fox) attempts a mystic poetic subject in "The Beggar Boy and the Christchild," from a German Christmas legend, and with considerable success. "The Watercress-gatherers," by Miss Cordelia Walker, and "The Ballad Singer," by Miss Alice Walker, with many points of merits in design, offend with their outrageously gaudy colouring. Mrs. Dundas Murray displays a genuine and truthful hand for landscape-painting in her views of "Dysart, Fifeshire," seen at early morning, and "Entrance to the Kyle Sku, Sutherlandshire." Mrs. Wilkes' views of "Tewkesbury, Shrewsbury," &c., are to be commended for their adherence to the "modesty of nature" in the treatment. Mrs. Valentine Bartholomew presents us contrasted aspects of female beauty in "The Nun" and "The Bride," besides a very good portrait of Miss Glyn as Cleopatra. Flowers, fruit, and stillife subjects, more or less successfully accomplished, are exhibited by Miss Lance, Miss James, Mrs. Withers, and Miss Emma Walker.

Burford's Panorama of Venice.—Mr. Burford, assisted by Mr. Selous, has just completed a fine panorama of the marble city of the isles, which is now on view at the Gallery in Leicester-square. The view is taken from a central point in the great square of St. Mark, and the most commanding feature is the celebrated Basilica of St. Mark, with its strange combination of almost all the styles of architecture, and its grand mosaics, executed at various periods, between the fourteenth and eighteenth centuries, and which are still in fine preservation. The Ducal Palace, the stupendous Campanile, the Churches of Santa Maria de Salute, St. Maire, Santa Maria Gloriosa, Il Giovanni e Paolo, &c., all form striking objects, surrounding the buildings of the grand square, which, with its fine architectural treatment and the varied and busy life displayed in it, is a picture in itself. The scene is supposed to be sketched during the period of the Carnival, and on the one side we have various groups of merrymakers appropriate to that festive occasion, whilst on the other is a long and stately procession entering the portals of the Cathedral. A glimpse here and there of the Lagune and the distant hills near Padua diversify the scene, which on so many accounts is one of unequalled grandeur and interest.

MUSIC.

Of the expected novelties at the Royal English Opera one has appeared—Mr. Henry Leslie's operetta, entitled "Romance," which was produced on Thursday. Next week we shall give some account of this piece and its performance. Mr. Vincent Wallace's "Lurline" is (in theatrical phrase) in active preparation. A new work from the pen of a composer of such high reputation is naturally looked for with much interest.

There are few concerts of note at this time of the year; our principal performers being much occupied with musical tours and other engagements in the provinces. Miss Dolby had a soirée on Tuesday evening, the last, we believe, that will be given by this accomplished lady as Miss Dolby. Her approaching change of condition will be attended with the best wishes of all who know her for her welfare and happiness. The Monday Popular Concert had its usual success; its principal feature was the appearance of the distinguished composer and violinist, Herr Molique. The Sacred Harmonic Society's performance last evening at Exeter Hall consisted of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum." We cannot but think that this great society ought to make some efforts by way of extending their very limited répertoire. There is no want of materials, if a little research and activity were employed in finding them and bringing them forward.

The Parisians are enjoying a much greater variety of first-rate musical entertainments than we are at present. At the Théâtre Italien Cimarosa's most charming comic opera, "Il Matrimonio Segreto," which in this country has been laid on the shelf for a quarter of a century, is drawing crowds every evening. At the Théâtre Lyrique the masterpieces of Glück, "Orphée" and "Iphigénie en Tauride," both produced since the beginning of the season, have been received with enthusiasm; and several French composers of the day have produced excellent and successful pieces, the last of which, "Ma Tante Dort," by Leon Durocher, is now running a triumphant course at the last-named theatre. The celebrated Richard Wagner has begun a series of concerts at the Italian Opera House, consisting of extracts from his dramatic works, which are daily becoming more and more popular throughout Germany. The first of these concerts, on Wednesday last, drew an immense audience, and the composer, whose merits have hitherto formed a quæstio vexatá, was received with every mark of the highest favour.

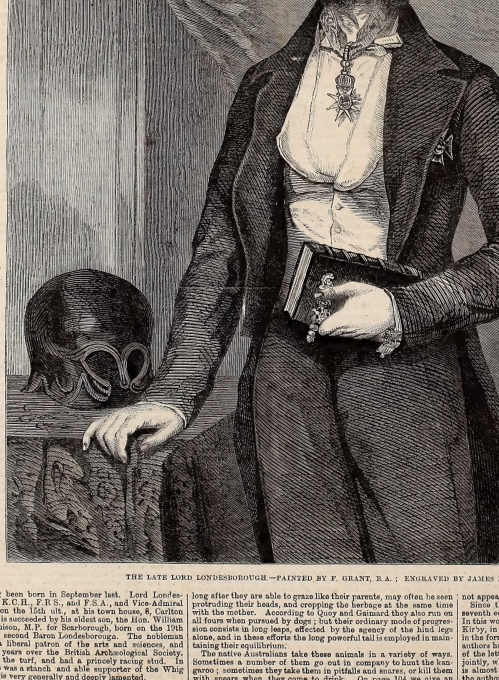
THE THEATRES, &c.

Lyceum.—On Monday Mr. Charles Dickens's fine story entitled "A Tale of Two Cities," and which was only lately completed in All the Year Round, was produced, having been prepared for the stage by Mr. Tom Taylor, under the superintendence of the distinguished author. The house was crowded on the occasion, the majority of the audience, we may presume, being well acquainted with the plot of the piece. In dramas, if such they can be called, of this kind some previous knowledge of the original romance is requisite, in order to the perfect understanding of the incidents, as much of the stage action must consist of suggestion rather than realisation. Mr. Taylor, we think, has done his work judiciously. The narrative of the sufferings of Colette Dubois has been thrown into a prologue; and the dying heroine (effectively impersonated by Madame Celeste) made an impression on the audience which much assisted the subsequent working of the plot by the undercurrent of interest which it has created. To Madame Celeste, also, was allotted the impersonation of Madame Defarge, the purpose of whose life was to avenge the wrongs that had been inflicted on her sister by the Marquis de St. Evremond (Mr. Walter Lacy). The character of Lucy Manette was artistically represented by Miss Kate Saville; while Mr. James Vining very ably indeed supported the part of her unfortunate father. He had to carry through a long scene of mental blankness, relieved only by incessant work at a pair of shoes which he had learned to make at the Bastille, until he could be made to recognise his daughter and his friends. The audience were kept in painful suspense, which not a little tried their patience; but the actor's art triumphed over the difficulties of the position. Mr. James Johnstone realised the part of Ernest Defarge with a certain rough vigour that told well with the audience; and Mr. T. Lyon, as Mr. Jarvis Lorry, played with a propriety and a force of style which does him infinite credit as an artist well practised and judicious. Mr. Villiers and Mr. Forrester acquitted themselves admirably as Sydney Carton and Charles Darnay. As an individuality Mr. Rouse was great in Jeremiah Cruncher; and Mr. Henry Butler meritorious in the sans culotte, Gaspard. The part of Madame Defarge harmonised well with Madame Celeste's manner, and was realised by her with commanding power. The piece was placed on the stage with a profusion of accessories. All was done that could be to illustrate the Reign of Terror. The scenes in Defarge's wine-shop in the St. Antoine were most ingeniously conducted; the rousing of the sections, and the dancing of the carmagnole, in particular, were replete with wild groupings and individual characteristics. Nor was the Revolutionary Tribunal less effective in its scenic arrangements; it was, besides, excellently acted. Altogether, the performance was an extraordinary success; but it occupied too much time, and will, doubtless, be abridged.

Astley's.—On Monday Mr. W. Cooke had his farewell benefit at this theatre, which was crowded on the occasion. The performance commenced with the last act of "Richard the Third," which was illustrated as usual with equestrian accessories. The scenes in the arena were more than usually effective; and the performances concluded with the pantomime of "Tom Moody." Mr. Cooke has well deserved of the public, and we were glad to see that his merits were so decidedly recognised.

On Monday night Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean commenced an engagement at the Queen's Theatre, Edinburgh.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul have introduced several changes in the programme of their clever entertainment at the St. James's Hall. In a new impersonation—"The Man who Knows Everybody"—Mr. Howard Paul displays a great deal of eccentric talent, and sings a patter song with wonderful rapidity; and, in the imitation of Mr. Sims Reeves, Mrs. Howard Paul sings with astonishing exactitude "Fra Poco," and a new Spanish serenade, "Lola." The salle continues to be crowded with fashionable audiences.



LORD LONDESBOROUGH.

THE Right Hon. Albert Denison Denison, Baron Londesborough, of Londesborough, in the east riding of the county of York, was the second surviving son of Henry, first Marquis Conyngham, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Joseph Denison, Esq., of Denbies, Surrey, and was brother of the present Marquis Conyngham. He was born the 21st of October, 1805, and early in life was in the Royal Horse Guards, from which he retired in 1824 to enter the diplomatic service as attaché to the British Legation at Berlin. In 1825 he was advanced to a similar position at Vienna; and in 1828 he became Secretary of Legation at Florence, whence he removed, in 1829, to Berlin, also as Secretary of Legation. His lordship remained at Berlin until 1830, when he returned to England, and after three years took his seat in the House of Commons as M.P. for the city of Canterbury, which place he continued to represent from 1833 to 1841, when ill health caused his temporary retirement. Hasgarn represented the same place from 1841 until his elevation to the peerage in 1850. On the death, in 1849, of his maternal uncle, William Joseph Denison, Esq., of Denbies, Surrey, and Seamor, Yorkshire, Lord Albert Conyngham became by that gentleman's will one of the most wealthy commoners in England: he came into the immediate possession of an enormous income. According to the arrangements of the will, the residue of the personal property was to be expended in the purchase of landed estates, to be entailed on three generations. The investment of this vast property secured to Lord Albert and his immediate heirs a rent roll of more than £70,000 a year in the county of York alone. His Lordship assumed by Royal license, the 4th of September, 1849, the surname of Denison only, in accordance with a provision of his uncle's will; and he was, on the 6th of March, 1850, created Baron Londesborough, a title taken from the estate of Londesborough, in York shire. Lord Londesborough married, first, July 6, 1833, Henrietta Maria, fourth daughter of Cecil Weld, first Lord Forester, and sister of John George, present Lord Forester, by whom she died the 22nd of April, 1841) he had two sons and four daughters, all of whom, except the second of third daughters, survive him. Albert Denison Somerville, the second son, is a Lieutenant in the Royal Navy. Lord Londesborough married, secondly, on the 21st of December, 1847, Ursula Lucy Grace, eldest daughter of the Hon. Charles Bridgeman, Rear-Admiral R.N., and granddaughter of Orlando, second Lord Bradford, by whom he survives him) he leaves four sons and two daughters, his youngest son having been born in September last. Lord Londesborough, who was a K.C.H., F.R.S., and F.S.A., and Vice-Admiral of Yorkshire, died on the 15th ult., at his town house, 8, Carlton House-terrace. He is succeeded by his eldest son, the Hon. William Henry Forester Denison, M.P. for Scarborough, born on the 19th of June, 1841, now second Baron Londesborough. The nobleman just deceased was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences, and president for some years over the British Archæological Society. He also patronised the turf, and had a princely racing stud. In politics his Lordship was a stanch and able supporter of the Whig party. His demise is very generally and deeply lamented.

The funeral of Lord Londesborough took place on Tuesday week in a vault within the church of Kirby Wharfe, which is close to Grimston Park, ten miles from York. The body had been lying in state at the mansion at Grimston for two days previously, and the circumstance attracted hundreds of persons from the surrounding neighbourhood. The hearse was drawn by six horses and in the five mourning-coaches used on the occasion were the Hon. W. H. F. Denison (who succeeds to the title), the Hon. Captain Denison, the Marquis Conyngham, Viscount Newport, the Earl of Chesterfield, Lord Forester, Lord Mountcharles, Sir W. Somerville, Sir Vincent Corbet, Colonel C. Forester, Colonel C. H. Forester, Colonel Ward, and Colonel Caulfield. The funeral was kept as private as possible, but notwithstanding more than 300 of Lord Londesborough's tenantry were present, each being desirous of paying a last tribute of respect to his memory, he having endeared himself to every one of them by his kindness and liberality as a landlord. The burial service was read by the Rev. R. Wilton, the Vicar, and the body was finally deposited in the spacious family vault, where already repose the remains of the deceased Lord's first wife and three of his children.

HUNTING THE KANGAROO.

THE kangaroos, a family of the Marsupialia, are almost entirely confined to Australia and Van Diemen's Land; but species are found in the adjacent islands, and even in New Guinea. They are entirely herbivorous, and live for the most part in the grassy plains. Some species, however, forming Dr. Gray's genus Petrogale are found in rocky districts. They are timid creatures, but when seized defend themselves with violent strokes of their hind feet, which from their great power and the strength of their nails constitute formidable weapons. In feeding they rest on the fore feet, and, when thus engaged, the young, which frequently retreat to the abdominal pouch long after they are able to graze like their parents, may often be seen protruding their heads, and cropping the herbage at the same time with the mother. According to Quoy and Gaimard they also run on all fours when pursued by dogs; but their ordinary mode of progression consists in long leaps, effected by the agency of the hind legs alone, and in these efforts the long powerful tail is employed in maintaining their equilibrium.

The native Australians take these animals in a variety of ways: sometimes a number of them go out in company to hunt the kangaroo; sometimes they take them in pitfalls and snares, or kill them with spears when they come to drink. On page 104 we give an engraving of the death of a red forester or old man kangaroo of Australia, from a sketch obligingly forwarded to us by Mr. Robert Steele, of Puketunoe, Otago, New Zealand, who was long a resident in the bush. The old man kangaroo is the patriarch of his flock, who, having escaped hurt for years, attains a great size.

The hunt of one of these kangaroo patriarchs is thus described by Mr. Kelly in his "Life in Victoria":—"While watching the washing out of some very rich stuff (at the Eureka gold-diggings) my attention was arrested by a distant uproar, at first mistaken for a 'licence hunt,' but the absence of 'Joe!' soon proved it was a commotion of another kind. Every hole was soon vacated, every dog let loose, and such a helter-skelter, pell-mell, heterogeneous hunt caused as I never saw the like of. Iran as well as my neighbours, and, as the chase was coming at right angles to my line, I soon saw it was a large old man kangaroo, the first I ever caught sight of in a wild state. Considering the broken nature of the ground, the speed it attained was very great, and some of its springs were beyond any limit I had ever previously formed of muscular projection. I do not believe, under any circumstances, it would have escaped the mixed and multitudinous pack by which it was pursued, but on even ground the chase would have been a long and exciting one. As it was, there was no fair play; not only was it followed by a mongrel posse of dogs and men from behind, but its path was gradually narrowed by lateral enemies, while even in front fresh foes were awaiting its advance, big dogs jumping at its throat, and big men aiming shrewd strokes at its head. At last the poor animal, in a misjudged jump, landed in a water-hole, from which it could not leap, and in this helpless state the harmless, meek-looking brute had its brains mercilessly beaten out."

The kangaroo, we are informed by Mr. Kelly, when taken young, is a most imitative animal, and in Sydney, quite Bendigo, who kept a lot of large kangaroo dogs, had one that played with the dogs, sat on end at the tenfire like a Christian, with the cat in his arms, and watched wistfully during meal-times for an occasional piece.

MR. WILLIAM SPENCE.

THE survivor of the authors of that classical work, "An Introduction to Entomology; or, Elements of the Natural History of Insects," died, at his residence in Lower Seymour-street, on Friday, the 6th ult., at the advanced age of seventy-seven. He had survived his friend and colleague, the Rev. W. Kirby, some years, but did not reach his very mature age. In early life Mr. Spence was engaged in business at Hull, and here it was he constructed that taste for the study of insects which led to his introduction to Mr. Kirby, and the production of the work which has made their names "familiar as household words" wherever insects are recognised as worthy of study. The history of the production of this work is the most interesting passage in the life of Mr. Spence, and this is most truly given in the "Life" of Mr. Kirby by Mr. Freeman. It has always been a matter of regret to Mr. Kirby's scientific associates that Mr. Spence had not been requested to undertake the biography of his friend. But enough exists in the "Life" to show that the work originated with Mr. Spence. He suggested the idea and plan of the work in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Kirby on the 23rd of November, 1808. He then proposed that they should write conjointly "A Popular Introduction to Entomology." The first volume of the work appeared in 1815. Before the second volume appeared, in 1817, the first volume had gone through three editions. The work was completed in four volumes, but Mr. Spence did not appear till 1826, on account of the illness of Mr. Spence.

Since the death of Mr. Kirby, Mr. Spence has published a seventh edition of this work in a cheaper and more portable form. In this work the matter supplied to Mr. Freeman for his "Life" of Kirby, in reference to the production of the Introduction, is given in the form of an Appendix. Here we find how fully the names of both authors have a right to be associated with this popular work. Many of the letters (for the work is in the form of letters) were written conjointly, whilst of those that were written separately the authorship is almost divided equally between the two. This work exhibited the authors as acute observers and men of no small literary ability. It quickly became a standard work on the subject in every country of the country, and has done perhaps more than any other work in diffusing a taste for entomology throughout Great Britain. Hitherto its authors were largely dependent on other observers for facts, yet they themselves had a great store of their own, especially on the habits of insects, which entitle them, independently of what their work they may have done, to a high position as observers. Mr. Spence's scientific labours, outside of this work, are principally devoted to entomology. Several papers by him have appeared from time to time in the transactions of our scientific societies and scientific journals.

Mr. Spence was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1834. He was also a Fellow of the Linnean Society and of several other scientific societies. During the latter part of his life he resided in London, and took an active part in the councils of the societies to which he belonged. He served as President of the Entomological Society, in which he had taken great interest from the time of its foundation. He was much esteemed amongst a large circle for his amiability and the quiet energy with which he endeavoured to carry out the great object of his life—the rendering popular natural-history knowledge. For the last few years, however, he had been afflicted with deafness, which compelled him to retire from his more active duties. He sat at one time in Parliament, and became very generally known for his advocacy of plans for making Great Britain independent of foreign nations. He wrote a pamphlet on this subject which attracted great attention at the time.

For the above particulars we are indebted to the Athenæum.

THE LATE MR. WILLIAM SPENCE, ONE OF THE VICE-PRESIDENTS OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

THE TAAL VOLCANO IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

THE Philippine Archipelago consists of a great number of islands of various sizes in the Eastern Seas, on many of which the Spaniards have establishments, while others are but little known. Their entire area is estimated at about 200,000 square miles. The two principal members of the group are Luzon and Nimdanao. The most northern portion of the archipelago is about eighty miles distant from Formosa; on the north-west the coast of China lies distant about three hundred miles; and Borneo is forty-five miles south of the extreme southern island of the group. The whole group abounds with volcanic formations. They were discovered by Magellan, the famous Spanish navigator, in 1521, and were named after Philip II. of Spain, then Prince of the Asturias, and since that time the Spaniards have held possession of the islands. In 1762 the English troops made a descent upon Manilla, captured it in ten days after landing, and compelled the Governor, who was an Archbishop, to pay a ransom of four millions of dollars (£862,500), on condition that the sack of the town should last only three hours. Not more than a fourth part of the stipulated sum was paid, however, in cash, as the Governor "gave a bill" for the balance on the Treasury of Madrid, which, of course, was dishonoured when presented for payment. By the Treaty of Paris we had to restore Manilla to Spain after an occupation of ten months. The famous expedition was under the command of Sir William Draper, and the letters of Junius on the subject and replies of Sir William must be familiar to many of our readers.

The volcano which forms the subject of our Engraving is on the island of Luzon, the same as that on which Manilla, the capital of the archipelago, is situated, and it stands in the centre of a lake, the circumference of which is about forty-five miles. The lake, or volcano, as it is termed, is nine miles in circumference, and its height above the level of the sea is 1667 feet. The volcanic crater at the summit shown in the Engraving rises from a lake of considerable dimensions, and of great depth. The whole surface of the islet is covered with lava several inches in depth, except in places where it has been exposed to the action of the periodical rains, and in those places a species of grass or bamboo grows to the height of five or six feet, and affords shelter for a few wild animals. It is stated that in 1716 excellent crops of cotton were obtained from the island of the volcano; but on the 24th of September of that year an eruption commenced, which destroyed all the vegetation and crops. It lasted four days, was accompanied with loud reports, which were heard forty miles from the place, and by numerous shocks of earthquake, which agitated the waters of the lakes like a hurricane. All the fish in the lake died, and were thrown up on the land as though they had been boiled, and the water became black as ink. In 1754 a still more destructive eruption occurred: four towns were destroyed, darkness covered the island, and the ashes from the volcano were carried as far as the city of Manilla. Since that time, now nearly a century, no eruption of any consequence has occurred.

The task of obtaining a picture of th wild and desolate-looking scene was, as may be supposed, one of no ordinary difficulty; and it has been accomplished by the aid of photography. Some time since Messrs. Negretti and Zambra, with an amount of enterprise for which they deserve the thanks of the public, dispatched a representative of their firm to China and Japan for the purpose of enabling "Englishmen who stay at home" to take a peep into the scenery and domestic institutions in these flowery lands. Having accomplished a considerable part of this interesting and difficult mission, he was directed to make his way to the Philippine Islands, and visit the Taal Volcano. The result is now before our readers, in the shape of an interesting contribution to the cause of science.

The difficulties which the photographer had to overcome in obtaining his negative of this volcano are thus described in a letter addressed by him to Messrs. Negretti and Zambra:—"I was surrounded with sulphurous vapour, more especially when the wind (which was continually shifting) was blowing towards me: such was the density of the vapour on one occasion, indeed, that my two guides bundled into my tent, to the great danger of my bath and chemicals. I send you the three negatives I was enabled to take, and would have gladly sent you duplicates; but after about a couple of hours' work my bath got covered with a black pellicle which adhered to the collodion, causing the plates to stain all over, so that I was obliged to give up. On the north-east of the small crater you will see a small lake: its waters are covered with a white vapour like steam; its borders strowed with a greenish-white sulphurous substance, caked like ice on the edge of a pond. The effect all along the edge of the lake is very curious. I attempted to descend from the great crater to the inner one, in order to follow your instructions as to the temperature and density of the water; but I felt so weak from excessive perspiration that I was obliged to desist. It has to be done by a rope. I, however, sent down one of my guides, who brought up a gourd full of water, the temperature of which was, when I received it, 110° Fahrenheit. I will send it to you if I have no accident, as it might be interesting to some of your scientific friends. I left the crater about twelve o'clock, and returned to Taal by half-past five, having wind and current in my favour."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

RECEPTION OF VOLUNTEERS BY THE QUEEN.

We are authorised to state that the Queen, having accepted the services offered by the very numerous corps of volunteers formed throughout the kingdom, has been graciously pleased to notify her intention of appointing a day for the special and exclusive reception of the officers of those corps at St. James's Palace, it having been represented to her Majesty that they generally are desirous of presenting themselves as volunteer officers before her Majesty.

Mr. Thomas Alexander, Director-General of the Army Medical Department, died on Wednesday morning from gout in the stomach.

The manufacture of Armstrong guns at Woolwich last week increased from twenty, the late weekly ratio, to forty-five.

The Lords of the Admiralty have granted permission to the artisans of the Devonport Dockyard to form themselves into rifle corps.

The Sun Insurance Company has offered a present of ten guineas to each of their official staff who may think proper to join rifle corps.

General Sir Thomas Macdougall Brisbane, Bart., President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, died at his seat near Largs, on Friday last. Sir Thomas was born, in the same house in which he died, on the 23rd of July, 1773, and was thus in his eighty-seventh year.

Colonel M'Murdo, C.B., Commandant of the Military Train, has been appointed Inspector-General of Volunteers. There are to be six sub-inspectors, with the rank of brigade-major, but the arrangements respecting the selection of these officers are not yet complete.

Rear-Admiral of the White the Hon. Sir Henry Keppel, K.C.B., has been appointed to the command of the Cape of Good Hope and West African station, vice Grey, and he will shortly hoist his flag on board the new 51-gun screw-frigate Forte at Sheerness.

The Assistant Under-Secretary of the War Department has issued a circular to the staff officers of pensioners in the several districts, accompanied by the Act passed at the end of the last Session; also, the warrant and regulations for an Army Reserved Force, calling the attention of the officers to the course which the Secretary of State for War requests them to adopt for making known the conditions of this service, and inducing suitable persons to engage in it.

Garibaldi has written a letter expressing his high sense of the services which the British volunteers may render to their country. He points to several instances in which volunteers have beaten off the most disciplined troops, and contends that, if well trained, our civilian riflemen will prove a wall of defence such as will render England—"the asylum of all, and the protectress of the universe"—impregnable against any foreign invasion.

A large number of the members of the London Rifle Brigade have united in presenting a testimonial to Lieutenant-Colonel Hicks, in acknowledgment of the service he has rendered in originating their corps. The testimonial consists of a fine charger, fully caparisoned. In the holsters is a pair of silver-mounted pistols bearing the inscription:—"The London Rifle Brigade, to its founder and first commanding officer, Lieutenant-Colonel George Montague Hicks. February, 1860."

The annual dinner of the Corps of Royal Engineers took place on Wednesday night at the Freemasons' Tavern. The chair was taken by Sir John Burgoyne, G.C.B.; and among the officers present were General Sir Charles Pasley, Lieutenant-General Oldfield, Major-General Sir Harry Jones; Colonels Sandham, Dawson, C.B.; Gordon, C.B.; Walpole, Ross, Chapman, C.B.; Hadden, Owen, C.B.; Lennox, and Montagu; Major Jervois, and Captain Vitch. The dinner being a domestic réunion guests are rarely invited, but on this occasion Major-General Sir F. Abbott and Major Patrick Stuart, of the East India Engineers, who have been co-operating with the Royal Engineers in several measures of public importance, and one or two others, were guests.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The American story, that Umpire is guarded by two bulldogs chained to his stable portals, has been improved on by some English alarmists, who first made out that he had been half worried by one of these grim guardians, and then killed him out of hand. Still his position in the betting has not been so very materially altered, but Thormanby, Buccaneer, and Mainstone now share the 11 to 1 premiership with him; a circumstance, we believe, without precedent four months before a Derby. For the Chester Cup very strong support has been given to the American horse, Satellite, and there has been a nibbler at Nutbourne, at 100 to 1. The acceptances will give the Ring full scope for talk next week, and on the week after next the Lincoln Grand Stand will be opened to inaugurate the 1860 season; although it may be urged that there has been a flat race at Manchester already. At present the acceptances for only four out of the six Spring Handicaps are declared: Gamester, 8st. 9lb., is one of the 51 "contents" in the Newmarket Handicap. Out of the 176 in the Chester Cup, 62 pay forfeit; and Underhand, 9st., Musjid, 8st. 4lb., and Nutbourne, 6st. 4lb., are left in. The Suburban and Metropolitan Handicaps have 100 and 55 acceptances respectively, and both Musjid, 8st. 4lb., and FitzRoland, 7st. 7lb., accept for the former.

We learn from the Sporting Magazine that Mr. Petroffski originally purchased Daniel O'Rourke, on behalf of his father, from Sir Tatton Sykes, for 1600 guineas; but that, thinking him rather too small (although he is at least half a hand bigger than he was when he won the Derby), he then gave the 2500 guineas for Rifleman instead. Sir Tatton has now replaced that son of Touchstone, by Colsterdale, a son of Lanercost, whom he purchased from Mr. Ashton, the owner of The Cure, for £1000. He is own brother to Ellerdale, and a horse with nice length and liberty, and a good deal of character in his thighs and quarters, in which his son Shafto very much resembles him. His stock so far are nearly all from half-bred mares; but he will now have some scope at last, especially as there are so many Sleight-of-Hand mares at Sledmere, and we have seen by Loupgarou's success how well the Lanercost and Pantaloon blood unite. Beadsman has gone to the stud; Cannobie is for sale; and the words "will be sold" annexed to the Grimston sale advertisement speak pretty emphatically as to the truth of the rumour that the present Lord Londesborough has no wish to continue the stud. The foreigners will, therefore, have a chance for Stockwell or West Australian. They are rather lively in their blood-stock researches at present; and it is said that the Russian Government offered £4000 in vain for Newminster not so very long since.

Mr. John Scott, the celebrated trainer, has not suffered a post to elapse without giving a most unqualified contradiction, through the Times, to the damaging statement made by the respondent respecting him in the divorce case of Boynton v. Boynton. He asserts most unequivocally that he never in his life dined or had luncheon with Captain and Mrs. Boynton at Beverley or elsewhere; and that, in fact, he was never in the Captain's house, or even saw his wife.

We regret to hear that the veteran Captain White has had a bad fall while hunting with the Cheshire, where the hounds (as they have been ever since his mastership ceased) are sadly overridden. Lord Dacre's huntsman had also a nasty fall near Hatfield a few days since. The Pytcheley have had some famous runs since the frost. On Friday, the 10th ult., they killed after an hour and fifty minutes from Berrydale; and on the 21st there was a clipping one hour and forty minutes from Waterloo Gorse. Within the last fortnight they have had several other good days, but have been rather unlucky in changing foxes when the hounds had fairly earned blood. Goodricke's Gorse was true to its old fame when the Earl of Stamford drew it yesterday week, and found plenty of foxes. The Brocklesby run we spoke of last week is, we are assured, the best thing they have had for nearly twenty years.

What with steeplechasing and coursing combined, the next will be a pretty busy week. Tuesday and Thursday are the Carmarthenshire Hunt Steeplechase days, and the Slough ones come off on Wednesday and Thursday. The Malton Union Coursing Club meets on Tuesday and Wednesday; and Longhorsley is fixed for Tuesday, &c.; Tarleton for Wednesday; Diamor (Meath) and Thorney (O), and Limerick Club (O), for Wednesday and Thursday; Ardrossan Club for Thursday; and Baldock Club for Thursday and Friday.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The adverse nature of the foreign exchanges, and the comparatively small arrivals of bullion from our usual sources of supply, have led to the withdrawal from the Bank of England of over £600,000 in gold for export purposes. This rapid decline in the stock of precious metals, and the limited supplies known to be on passage from Australia—£412,000—added to an active demand for discount accommodation, have compelled the Directors of the Bank of England to advance their minimum rate of discount to four per cent. In many instances advances upon paper having more than three months to run have been refused. The activity in the demand for money to meet engagements falling due on the 4th has led to a sudden rise in the value of discount accommodation in the Stock Exchange to four and even five per cent. Following the market, the various discount-houses and companies have advanced their rates for money on call from two to three per cent, and at seven days' notice from two-and-a-half to three-and-a-half per cent. The rate for deposits at the London joint-stock banks is now three per cent.

The rise in the price of money has led to heavy sales of the Unfunded Debt, and a somewhat serious decline in the premium. Consols, too, have suffered, but not to any extent; whilst Indian securities have all given way, although, for the most part, they have been in the hands of wealthy holders.

The all absorbing topic of conversation amongst the holders of capital is,—will money become dearer? When we consider the actual wants of trade and commerce—the enormous quantities of rupee paper which is now afloat here—and the state of the foreign exchanges, our impression is that we shall shortly have the Bank minimum at five per cent. Even that rate may not wholly check the outflow of bullion; but, no doubt, it will induce great caution in carrying out operations of a purely speculative character.

The total imports of bullion have been under £300,000, including several parcels of silver from the Continent. The whole of the gold at hand has been taken for export.

The silver market is flat, at 5s. 2¼d. to 5s. 2⅜d. per ounce standard.

At the half-yearly meeting of the London and County Bank a dividend at the rate of 11 per cent per annum was declared.

Ocean Marine Insurance Shares have been dealt in at 2½ ¼ prem.; the Universal, ¾ prem.; the Bank of Turkey, ½ dis. to par; and the Canada Loan, 2¼ prem.

The dealings in Home Stocks on Monday were only moderate, and prices exhibited a drooping tendency:—Bank Stock was done at 229; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents touched 94½ ⅜ ¼; Consols, 94¼ 94; India Five per Cents, 103¾ ½ ¼; Ditto Debentures, 1858, 97¾; Ditto, 1859, 97⅝; Consols for Account, 94¼ 94⅛; Exchequer Bills, 22s. to 26s. prem. India Enfaced Paper was done at 94¾ 98; Ditto Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104⅜ ¼. The rise in the Bank rate for money produced some business on Tuesday:—Consols were done at 93⅞ 94⅛ ¼; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 94¼ ⅜; India Debentures, 96¾ 97¼; India Bonds, par to 5s. prem.; and Exchequer Bills, 18s. to 21s. prem. Bank Stock sold at 228 to 230; India Stock, 218 to 220; Indian Loan, 103 to 103½; the Five per Cent Rupee Loan, 97½ ¾; and the Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 103½ ¾. On Wednesday prices were tolerably firm, although a large number of realisations on banking account took place:—Bank Stock left off at 230½ to 229; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 94⅝ ½; India Stock, 217 to 220; India Loan, 103½; Ditto Debentures, 96¾ 97¼; Rupee Five per Cents, 97 to ½; Five-and-a-Half per Cents, 103 to ½; India Bonds, 2s. dis. to 3s. prem.; and Exchequer Bills, 10s. to 15s. premium. The drain of gold from the Bank having become less severe, there was an improved feeling in Home Stocks on Thursday:—Consols touched 94⅜ ½; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 94¼ ½; Exchequer Bills, 10s. to 15s. prem. Bank Stock was 229 to 230½. India Enfaced Five per Cent was heavy, at 97¼; and the Five-and-a-Half per Cents, 102¾. The Debentures realised 97.

An instalment of 8 per cent has been paid on the Canadian Loan of £1,800,000.

It has been announced to the subscribers to the Rio Drainage Company that the whole of their deposits will be returned to them.

Notwithstanding the heavy state of the Consol Market, about an average business has been transacted in the Foreign House. Prices certainly have shown a tendency to give way, but the actual decline in them has been trifling. The leading quotations for the week are as follows:—Brazilian Five per Cents, 103; Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1858, 93; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 98½; Chilian Three per Cents, 71; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 66¼; Dutch Four per Cents, 102; Mexican Three per Cents, 21¾; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 94½; Peruvian Three per Cents, 71½; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 98; Russian Three per Cents, 65½; Sardinian Five per Cents, 85; Spanish Three per Cents, 44½; Ditto, New Deferred, 33¼; Ditto, Committee's Certificates of Coupon, not funded, 4¾; Swedish Four per Cents, 82; Turkish Six per Cents, 78½; Ditto New, 66; Turkish Four per Cents, 104⅝; and Venezuela Three per Cents, 26¾.

The Miscellaneous Market has ruled inactive, as follows:—Australian Agricultural, 33; Canada Land, 115½; Crystal Palace, 1½; Ditto, Preference, 5; English and Australian Copper-smelting Company, 2⅛; London District Telegraph, 1; Madras Irrigation and Canal, 2⅜; Peninsular and Oriental Steam, New, 28; Royal Mail Steam, 52¾; East and West India Docks, 117; St. Katharine, 76 ex div.; Victoria, 133½; Birmingham Canal, 96; Leeds and Liverpool, 515; Regent's, 20½ ex div.; Chelsea Waterworks, 15½ ex div; East London, 131½ ex div.

Although the dividends for the past half-year will mostly come up to previous estimates, the Railway Share Market has continued heavy, at drooping quotations. The traffic returns continue good, and the "calls" for the present month are only £150,806. Annexed are Thursday's official closing quotations:—

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Jan. 30.—The quantity of English wheat on offer in to-day's market was limited, and in very middling condition. Good and useful qualities sold steadily, at full prices; but other kinds were very dull, at barely late rates. In foreign wheat—the show of which was moderately extensive—only a limited business was transacted, at previous quotations; whilst floating cargoes were neglected. The barley trade ruled firm, and, in some instances, prices had an upward tendency. Malt was unaltered in value, and the demand for it was slow. Oats maintained their previous value, but the inquiry was restricted. Beans and peas were firm in price, and flour ruled steady.

Feb. 1.—Fine wheat, barley, and beans changed hands somewhat freely. Other kinds of produce ruled inactive, on former terms.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s. to 46s.; ditto, white 38s. to 41s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s. to 46s.; rye, 28s. to 31s.; grinding barley, 26s. to 28s.; distilling ditto, 28s. to 30s.; malting ditto, 38s. to 41s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt 60s. to 66s.; brown ditto, 48s. to 49s.; Kingston and Ware, 54s. to 66s.; Chevalier, 67s. to 71s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 20s. to 25s.; potato ditto, 25s. to 29s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 25s; ditto, white 20s. to 27s.; tick beans, 34s. to 39s.; grey peas, 32s. to 34s.; maple, 37s. to 38s.; white, 36s. to 38s.; boilers, 38s. to 40s. per quarter. Town-made flour, 41s. to 43s.; town households, 36s. to 37s.; country marks, 30s. to 36s. per 280lb.; American flour, 23s. to 27s. er barrel; French ditto, 29s. to 36s. per sack.

Seeds.—Linseed commands full prices. Most other seeds support last week's currency.

Linseed, English, crushing, 48s. to 52s.; Calcutta, 48s. to 49s.; hempseed, 35s. to 36s. per quarter; coriander, 15s. to 18s. per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s. to 14s.; ditto, white, 15s. to 16s.; tares, 7s. to 7s. 6d. per bushel. English rapeseed, 50s. to 60s. per quarter. Linseed cakes, English, £9 10s. to £10 0s.; ditto foreign, £9 10s. to £10 15s.; rape cakes, £5 10s. to £6 per ton; canary, 58s. to 62s. per quarter. Red clover 52s. to 60s.; white ditto, 62s. to 90s. per cwt.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 10d.; barley, 34s. 7d.; oats, 21s. 6d.; rye, 28s. 11d.; beans, 38s. 5d.; peas, 36s. 3d.

The Six Weeks' Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 11d.; barley, 34s. 7d.; oats, 21s. 4d.; rye, 32s. 5d.; beans, 39s. 0d.; peas, 37s. 1d.

English Grain Sold last Week.—Wheat, 116,761; barley, 83,464; oats, 16,827; rye, 172; beans, 5809; peas, 1963 quarters.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d. to 7½d.; of household ditto, 5d. to 6½d. per 4-lb. loaf.

Tea.—Although the shipments from China show an excess of 21,000,000lb. when compared with last year, our market is very firm, and prices have had an upward tendency. The value of common sound congou is 1s. 5¼d. to 1s. 6d. per lb.

Sugar.—We have less activity to report in the demand for raw sugars. In some instances the quotations have ruled lower. Refined goods move off slowly, at 51s. to 61s. 6d. per cwt. for common brown lumps.

Coffee.—Rather large quantities having been brought forward, the demand has ruled less active, and, in some instances, the quotations have slightly given way.

Rice.—There is very little inquiry for any kind. In prices, however, scarcely any change has taken place.

Provisions.—For most kinds of butter the inquiry is far from active, nevertheless prices continue steady. Carlow is selling at 110s. to 120s.; Waterford, 9s, to 114s.; Limerick, 106s. to 112s. per cwt. Bacon maintains late currencies—Waterford sizeable being quoted at 60s. to 62s. per cwt. In the value of other provisions no quotable change has taken place. English eggs are in request, at from 14s. to 15s.; and French at 12s. to 13s. per 120.

Tallow.—The demand is steady, and prices have further advanced. P.Y.C. on the spot is quoted at 59s. 6d.; and for delivery during the last three months, 53s. to 53s. 6d. per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil is selling at 27s. 6d. per cwt. on the spot. Most other oils are tolerably firm in price. Spirits of turpentine, 36s. to 36s. per cwt.

Spirits.—Rum moves off slowly, at barely the late decline in value. The brandy market is active, at 11s. per gallon for the best qualities. In grain spirit about an average business is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 10s. to £4 4s.; clover ditto, £3 10s. to £5; and straw, £1 5s. to £1 10s. per load. A fair demand.

Coals.—Best house coals, 20s. 6d. to 21s.; seconds, 18s. to 20s.; Hartley's, 14s. to 15s.; and manufacturers', 13s. 6d. to 15s. per ton.

Hops.—All new hops continue to move off steadily, at full quotations. Otherwise, the demand is in a sluggish state.

Wool.—English qualities are firm, but not dearer. Foreign and Colonial parcels command very little attention.

Potatoes.—The supplies are moderately good, and the demand may be considered steady, at from 80s. to 140s. per ton.

Metropolitan Cattle Market.—(Thursday, Feb. 2.)—About an average supply of beasts was on sale here to-day, in good condition. Nearly all breeds moved off slowly, yet Monday's prices were well supported. We were tolerably well supplied with sheep. Prime Downs and half breeds realised full currencies, with a steady trade. Other descriptions of sheep were less active, on former terms. The few calves on offer sold steadily, at fully previous rates, the top quotations being 5s. 10d. per 8lb. Pigs were in fair request, at extreme quotations. Milch cows, however, were a dull inquiry. Per 8lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 6d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime Scots, &c., 4s. 8d. to 4s. 10d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; second quality ditto, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s. 10d. to 5s. 2d.; prime Southdown ditto, 5s. 4d. to 5s. 6d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 10d. to 5s. 4d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 6d. to 5s. 10d.; large hogs, 3s. 6d. to 3s. 10d.; neat small porkers, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 10d.; suckling calves, 19s. to 22s.; and quarter-old store pigs, 23s. to 30s. each. SIR W. C. ROSS, R.A.

SIR WILLIAM CHARLES ROSS, whose death we have recently had occasion to announce, is entitled to a place of no mean importance in the history of the modern British school of painting. He was the last very eminent practitioner of his day in an art which photography, plain and coloured, is now rapidly pushing from its place; and, as miniature-painter to the Queen and Court, he occupied in his own peculiar department much the same pre-eminence and influence which Lawrence did in his. The high-born scions and aristocratic beauties of the nineteenth century will owe much to the judicious ideal treatment and the improving pencils of both, which, without departing from the actual truth of portraiture, had the tact to seize upon the pleasantest points of truth, and to turn them to the best account.

But, although miniature-painting was the speciality to which this artist chiefly devoted himself in the more active part of his career, it was not that in which he commenced life. Born in London, in 1794, he was by parentage almost predestined to the profession of an artist; his father being a teacher of drawing and miniature-painter of some standing, and his mother, the sister of Ankor Smith, the engraver, being herself an artist of some ability. At ten years of age he was entered as a student at the Royal Academy. Historical art first employed his pencil, and when in his thirteenth year (1807) he gained the prize of a silver palette at the Society of Arts for a copy in chalk of Smith's engraving of "The Death of Wat Tyler." Other prizes quickly followed—in 1808 the silver medal and £20 from the same society for an original drawing, "The Judgment of Solomon;" in 1809 the large silver palette for a miniature of "Venus and Cupid;" in 1810 the silver medal and £20 for a drawing of "Samuel Presented before Eli;" in 1811 the silver medal for a drawing of "The Triumph of Germanicus;" and in 1817 the society's gold medal for a painting, "The Judgment of Brutus," and the Royal Academy silver medal for an academical drawing.

But historic and poetic art he soon found to be an unprofitable field, and he was not disposed to sacrifice his professional interests to an ungrateful public taste. Pursuing his studies under his father, and afterwards under Mr. Andrew Robertson, the miniature-painter, Mr. Ross soon acquired that proficiency of skill, guided by fine artistic taste, which secured him the highest position in a much-patronised branch of the profession. Never was miniature-painter so run after. His sitters comprise a whole generation of the Court, the Peerage, and the Parliament.

In 1837 he was appointed miniature-painter to her Majesty, who had recently acceded to the throne, and who has sat to him more than once. In the following year he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy. The coveted degree of R.A. followed in February, 1842, and soon afterwards he received the honour of knighthood. When the great cartoon competition in connection with the decoration of the new Houses of Parliament was instituted Sir W. Ross sent in anonymously a cartoon, measuring ten feet eight inches square, representing "The Angel Raphael Discoursing with Adam," which obtained one of the additional premiums of £100, and which proved that he had not lost his love for large subjects nor the power of hand necessary for their treatment.

Within the last year or two ill-health has confined Sir W. Ross very much to his house, and his exhibited works have been comparatively few. He died on the 20th of January, in his sixty-sixth year. In the Art-Journal for 1849 it is mentioned that Sir W. Ross's works had already numbered two thousand and fifty. The number has, of course, considerably increased since.

SOIREE OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.

THE Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts has entered upon the second year of its career, and gave a grand opening soirée for the year 1860 at the Suffolk-street Gallery, on Thursday week, the 26th of January. It is the speciality of this society, and herein consists its strength and its hope of successful working, that it combines all departments of fine art—painting, sculpture, architecture, music, and poetry, and brings into association the professors, and the patrons and votaries of each. That this object has been appreciated by those whom it concerns is proved by the generous alacrity with which the galleries of the various exhibiting societies were last year thrown open to the society for its conversaziones, and the emulation displayed by musical artists to contribute to the eclat of these reunions by exerting their talents gratuitously; and the consequence was a series of entertainments novel in their character, and of mixed and undeniable attractiveness. On Thursday week the opening soirée of the season was given at the rooms above named, on the invitation of Mr. H. Wallis, whose fine collection of pictures of modern British art, comprising some of the finest specimens of our best men—Callcott, Constable, Turner, Mulready, Etty, Leslie, &c.—graced the walls; whilst the Vocal Association, one of the most important and influential societies connected with the advance of music, came forward with their best voices, some sixty or seventy in number, to give a selection of madrigals, part-songs, and other vocal music. M. Benedict, the eminent composer, may have been indefatigable in training this large choral band, amounting in all, we believe, to some thousand or upwards, but he could hardly conduct the proceedings, alternately with his coadjutor, Dr. James Pech, who contributed two new four-part songs, especially composed for the occasion, and respectively entitled "The Three Kings" and "The Bridal Morn," which were eminently successful. Selections from Bishop, Smart, Benedict, and others completed the programme, with "God Save the Queen," impressively rendered, as the finale. And this purely English concert, in the midst of English pictures, was extremely well relished by a crowded audience, upwards of eight hundred in number, amongst whom were recognised some of the most eminent men in art and literature. The gallery itself is well known as the premises of the Society of British Artists, and is one of the best in London, measuring 72 feet by 50 feads, with smaller apartments beyond. The whole suite of apartments was admirably lighted by gas, the light in the large room passing through a skylight or ceiling of ground-glass, the effect of which was striking, without tiring or trying the eye.

We are glad to see this young society advancing quietly, but surely, to a position it is so justly entitled to occupy. It has only to avoid ellquism, and its mission will be a most useful as well as most gratifying one. It has taken permanently rooms at 9, Conduit-street, Regent-street, where meetings for discussions, lectures, exhibitions, &c., will be held regularly on alternate Thursdays (besides extra nights) throughout the season; in addition to which, we are promised six conversaziones, with music, successively at various exhibiting galleries in the metropolis. A scheme of prizes for works in the various departments of art, including music, is also about to be inaugurated in the coming season, and already excites considerable attention and curiosity in the circles interested in it. There may be difficulty, perhaps danger, in the attempt; but when was anything great done, that was accomplished without encountering difficulty and danger at the outset? The prize system in art was adopted by the Society of Arts in the Adelphi upwards of half a century since, and it is carried out by the Royal Academy; and more recently it has been brought into operation at Liverpool, Manchester, Leamington, and other provincial towns, with considerable effect and more or less success; and we see no reason why the art community of the metropolis, fairly organised as that of Liverpool has been for their own benefit, should not attempt the same thing with satisfaction and credit to themselves, and with useful results to art and artists.

WALSALL FREE LIBRARY.

THE Act, obtained by Mr. Ewart, authorising the establishment and support of free libraries and museums to be supported by rates not exceeding one penny in the pound, has not been largely put in operation in the country generally. In two towns in Staffordshire, however, Lichfield and Walsall, the provisions have been adopted.

The building at Walsall, erected from the design of Messrs. Nicholls and Morgan, of Westbromwich, was completed and inaugurated during the year just closed. It is situated near the Assembly Room. The style is Italian, and the design chaste and effective. The building comprises an entrance-hall with glass screen to form vestibule, library with gallery, a very large and admirably lighted reading-room, committee and other rooms; and, in addition, a residence for the librarian. The fittings and furniture are convenient, substantial, and in harmony with the general character of the building.

THE FARM.

In the old huntsman who observed, "I wish they'd be done with this draining, it's just the ruin of scent," could have had his wish fulfilled, England would have been in a state of deluge by this time. It is generally allowed that we have not had any very bad year for nearly three years, but it has been amply made up for at last. In the northern counties the snow was ten inches thick in the south part of this week, and a traveller on the Great Northern might have seen it gradually decreasing till within sixty miles of the metropolis. As a general thing, however, his wish has not suffered, although it looks yellowish in a few places. The almost universal rot among the turnips, arising from the first frost, is the great cause of rural lamentation, and we hear of it everywhere, especially in Norfolk. Good linseed cake has sprung upwards of a pound a ton in consequence. The former prelude a mild and early spring, which will be sadly needed for the lambs. The question "Will the ewe breed twice a year?" has been a good deal ventilated of late, and one farmer who has a flock of 500 ewes speaks of having had six lambs, at three births, he has thus foreseen months.

Another remarkable instance of fecundity has occurred on the farm of Mr. Cant, of Dymock, in Gloucestershire, where a cow has had twins three, between February the 8th and January the 3rd. The exportation of cattle and sheep continues pretty brisk, and we hear with much interest of the arrival of Vanderveldo along with a cow and heifer at the River Plate, where shorthorns never penetrated before. They were purchased from Mr. Grundy, of the Dales, by the well known Baron Mauá, and the thoroughbred bull, Sir Hugh, was the companion of their seafaring fortunes. Vanderveldo is by Colonel Townley's Warwick, from Mr. Grundy's Violet, and was highly commended as a bull calf at Chester. A long price has been offered for the bull by a gentleman who was anxious to have him for the Cup in Ireland, but we fancy that Mr. Grundy wants to try and hold his own with her again this year at the Canterbury Royal. An offer of £400 has been refused for the Warwick heifer Alpha, by a firm in direct descent from Booth's Bracelet; and we understand that three other heifers of Warwick's have been purchased for the same to a well-known purchaser at £200 each, with the proviso that only two of them are to be taken.

Mr. Jacques's Weatherbit, the best son of the once-favourite Sheet Anchor, and the sire of Weathergage and Headsman, is one of the illustrations of the Farmers' Magazine this month, along with the renowned boar Carswall the Second, the winner of the first prize in his class at the Warwick Royal, and of eleven other first prizes since. The picture of the brown is by Corbet (a very rising young artist), and a good likeness, though perhaps a trifle too plain in the forehand. The use of sewage in irrigation (a subject on which a lance will probably be broken with Alderman Mechi at the Farmers' Club on Monday night) is the subject of a paper by Mr. Cuthbert Johnson, who considers that the collected sewage of the northern portion of London should be raised from its proposed outfall on to the side of the Essex slopes, and then directed by means of partially-covered, but generally open, channels towards the sea. There are thousands of acres, he adds, of marsh land on the second of Essex near the mouths of the Thames and the Crouch very admirably adapted to receive the sewage of the metropolis, and the present owners would gladly lease it. "The Farmer's Herd" is the one for the month, and commences with a sketch of the first beginning of Gravett's "Herd Book," under the late Mr. Wiltshire's auspices at Otley. It was this gentleman who first inoculated Mr. Pawkes with his taste for shorthorns; and, beginning with Waverley, we have the herd traced (with the aid of old Fairy Tale) from Sir Thomas Fairfax, and so through the celebrated royal prize bulls Sir Edmund Lyons, Commodore, Bouquet, John of Gront, and King Arthur. Big, wealthy bull calves have always been a great speciality in this herd, as also are the fine old-fashioned cows, among which old Lady Pre-chette still shows so gaily, although "old Father Time has dispensed his fool's-fat with such a liberal hand."

The Phare de la Loire states that the workmen engaged at St. Nazaire in new-sheathing the ship Laurence, recently returned from Australia, found a fragment of the horn of a sea-cow, which had penetrated to the depth of five inches into the keel, after passing through a sheet of copper as thick as a two-franc piece.

DESTRUCTION OF BIRDS FORBIDDEN.—The destroying all birds, except game to eat, has been recently prohibited in many of the small German districts, as the Rhine country is quite full of vermin, but we have urged are these—wherever the farmers have killed the rooks, jays, and even the sparrows, the insects have risen in a tenfold degree. Consequently, Able naturalists have reported that the vast quantity of noxious vermin which the birds destroy far counterbalance the small injury they do, and destroy in searching for the insects on which they feed.

DESTRUCTION OF RATS.—Dr. HUGHES'S MANUFACTORIES.—A painful rumour has been the topic of conversation in literary circles during the past week. Reports have reached us that some chasm full of uncertainty, left by the celebrated Dr. George Hickes, the deprived Dean of Worcester, were endeavoured to be filled up by the name of Dr. George Hickes, amongst the Elzevirs. Able naturalists have reported that the vast quantity of noxious vermin which the birds destroy far counterbalance the small injury they do, and destroy in searching for the insects on which they feed.

The Rev. John Sparrow was one of the Anglo Saxon scholars of the English Church at the eventful period of the Revolution, but of papers illustrative of the biographical and literary history of the close of the seventeenth century. For it is well known that Dr. Hickes was a person of such political, ecclesiastical, and literary eminence in his time that he was in daily correspondence with the most learned men at home and abroad. It is undoubtedly to contemplate the less flattering picture he sustained when we consider that Dugdale, Gibson, Nicolson, Elstob, Robert Harley Earl of Oxford, Wanley, Pepy's, Kettlewell, Jurney, Collier, Dodwell, and his bosom friend the pious Robert Nelson, were among his correspondents. Dr. Hickes died on December 15, 1715. Mr. Thomas Bowtle was his executor, and Mr. Amesley the overseer of his will.—Notes and Queries.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

ELECTRICITY.—M. Du Moncel has just published his latest "Researches on the Non-Homogeneity of the Spark of Induction."

TEMPERATURE OF VEGETABLES.—M. Becquerel has read before the French Academy of Sciences a third memoir on this interesting subject. The horse-chestnut was the tree chosen for the experiments.

M. CAHOURS' "Researches on the Organo-Metallic Radicals," in the new number of the Annales de Chimie, will much attract the attention of all scientific chemists. The article embraces eighty-two pages.

M. LOUIS FIGUIER'S "Année Scientifique et Industrielle" (the fourth year) has just appeared. It consists of 709 duodecimo pages, beautifully printed, price three francs. It treats of the scientific labours of savans during the past year; of inventions and of the promising applications of science to the industrial arts in France and other foreign countries. It is a suitable companion to the "Year Book of the Intellectual World."

A NEW BLACK.—M. Goffin has prepared from the Boghead cannel coal a black, which he calls "Anthracine." It is insoluble in water, and reducible to a state of very great tenuity. The calcination of the coal is effected in close chambers, so as to collect the gas it contains, to obtain illuminating gas. The coke is then reduced into powder by a mill, or by passing through cylinders. The black thus obtained is advantageously employed to replace ivory-black, lampblack, and animal charcoal, in many of their industrial applications.—Times.

STEREOSCOPIC GLASSES FOR SINGLE PICTURES.—Professor Wharton Jones has invented glasses which give a stereoscopic effect to single pictures of any kind when we look through them with both eyes. These glasses, mounted in the eyepieces of a binocular, opera, or field glass, or in common spectacle frames, also bring out in a wonderful manner, and with increased stereoscopic effect, objects at some distance, such as the actors on the stage, the opposite side of the street, and scenery in the natural landscape. Instruments with greater exactness the relative position and the projecting or receding of distant objects.

LECTURES AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.

DR. EDWIN LANKESTER, on Saturday last, gave an introductory lecture to his course on "The Structure of Man, in relation to the Inferior Animals." He first gave a sketch of the relations of the external world to man, and then of the nervous system of animals. The chemical relations of animal compounds found in animal substances. He contrasted the properties of cellulose, the principal substance found in the structure of vegetables, which constitutes the cell-basis of animals. The latter substance, combined with phosphate of lime, is the basis of bone. Gelatine, fat, &c., constituted the distinguishing features of animal substances. The chemical and physical properties of these substances were then considered, and the lecturer announced that he should treat his subject in future lectures according to a natural MS history classification.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL delivered his third lecture on "Light" on Thursday, January 26. In a series of brilliant and instructive experiments the professor showed that in a pure spectrum no colour is produced by the overlapping of other colours. The first experiment in the quantity of rays of light within a body; and that coloured bodies absorb all the coloured rays except their own. The electric light was next shown through glasses containing ink, port wine, litmus water, a solution of permanganate of potash, cabbage liquor, potash, &c. The changes of colour produced by interposing chemical reagents (acids and alkalis) into some of these were remarkably displayed. Perfect opacity is produced by the combination of transparent coloured substances; red and blue glasses combined making black. The colours of leaves and flowers were shown to be not pure, but mixed. The remarkable fact was mentioned that the solar spectrum is not perfectly continuous throughout, but is broken by a multitude of fine lines, the rays corresponding to which are missing. These lines are named, after their discoverer, Fraunhofer. The spectra obtained from the most splendid pinaste give spectra with dark lines, like the spectrum of the sun; but the spectra of the fixed stars differ from the sun's, and from each other. In the respect, by a series of beautiful experiments it was also shown that the spectrum of the electric spark varies with the substances between which the spark passes. The volatile ores obtained from metals (copper, zinc, brass, &c.) emitted distinct groups of rays of different refrangibilities. The spectra of such ores consist, therefore, of series of brilliant bands of different colours.

PROFESSOR OWEN'S LECTURE ON THE CEREBRAL (BRAIN) CLASSIFICATION OF THE MAMMALIA.—In this lecture were traced the progressive steps in the classification of the mammalia from the time of Aristotle to that of Ray, Linnæus, and Cuvier. Admitting the great superiority of the last-named naturalist, Professor Owen pointed out certain defects in his system—shown by the sloth being put above the horse, the seals above the dog, and the bats and the two-lobed mammalia (marsupialia) above the elephant—which led him, many years ago, to seek for some truer basis of classification than the teeth, claws, feet, nipples, &c., which had afforded grounds of division to previous classifiers. This true basis he believed to be afforded by the structure of the brain. The professor then proceeded to describe the variations of cerebral structure which he had met with in examining the numerous specimens which had died from time to time at the Zoological Gardens, arranging those variations gradationally from the most simple and unchanged, represented by the horse (solipeda), or loose brains; (lisencephala), or smooth brains; (gyrencephala), or true brains; and cervicus-apelda, or chief brains. The last modifications are presented exclusively by mankind, and proved our species not merely to be the representative of the highest grade in order, but of a distinct primary sub-class in the mammalian series. Professor Owen, in the course of his illustrations, alluded to his discovery of the Megalonyx, an extinct mammal, supposed, of which a specimen had been lately sent to the British Museum by the Hon. H. Sandford, Consul General Secretary at the Hamilton. This was the first specimen of the kind which had reached England, and the only one which had reached Europe since the time of Buffon. It was the Science Mendegascarienne of Linnæus, and the Chirenge of Cuvier, and remained as they had placed it. The most remarkable peculiarity was the form of Vesbe and Van der Hoeven) amongst the Rodentia. The application of the cerebral character proved, however, that it was a modified cavy or insect, and lives principally on caterpillars, which burrow in the hard wood of forests; and the fact that this remarkable animal has the tendencies modified for gnawing down to the grub, and it has one singular contingent lengthened and strengthened, and terminated by a claw, for digging the grub from its burrow. The lecture was illustrated by figures of the species, drawn by Sowerby and by numerous lifelike figures of other animal species by the same eminent artist; also by diagrams of the principal structures of the brain, and a table of the classifications framed by the professor.

Professor Owen, on Tuesday last, delivered his fourth lecture on fossil reptiles. He gave an interesting account of the discovery of the remarkable footprints of the saurians in the coal strata of North America, in 1844, by Dr. King, of Greensburg, Pennsylvania, and dwelt particularly on the remarkable anatomical characters of the footprints of the species of the genus Sauropus, or bird-foot. The professor then introduced his audience to the cheiroterium of the Iguanodon, a wild beast of Sussex, whose bones, like the handles of knives, are so abundant in the sandstones of Cheshire, Warwickshire, &c. It is now ascertained that the Iguanodon had their hinder feet formed like those of the ostrich in the section of its teeth, which was made known by Professor Owen in 1838. The sauropterygia (or winged lizards) will be discussed in the next lecture.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD NORTH.

The Right Hon. Dudley North, Lord North, was the eldest son of Francis North, sixth and present Earl of Guilford, by his second wife (his first died without issue), Lady Georgiana Augusta Frederica Elizabeth Mary Parker, Viscountess Maidstone, and Countess of Macclesfield in her own right, by her mother, Lucy Anne, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Ives, Rector of Bishopsbourne, by his wife, the Dowager Lady Grey de Ruthyn. Lord North had by his first marriage a family of five children, their mother having survived to deprive his untimely death, which occurred at Wateringbury, Kent, on the 24th of January, in the forty-fourth year of his age. In mid-year, consequently becomes the heir apparent of his grandfather, the venerable Earl of Guilford.

JOHN EDDOWES SPARROWE, ESQ.

MR. J. S. SPARROWE, who died suddenly at Ipswich on the 24th of January, at the age of sixty-two, was a descendant of the Sparrowes of Bishopshall, one of the most ancient families in the county and the town. Of their immediate progenitors, the Sparrowes of Bramford, in the neighbourhood, in the county of Suffolk, and perhaps by his side at the battle of Hexham, in 1463. His fidelity to the House of York was rewarded by the most signal favours. Another of the family fell at the battle of Bosworth Field; and a third superintended the secret burial of the unfortunate Edward at the Austin Friars. Cardinal Wolsey was planning a great collegiate establishment for his own birthplace. He was prevented by his fall in power, but Archbishop Warham expended rooms of dark oak and its curious ecclesiastical figures, is supposed to have been the work of Wolsey's sculptures in the same style, and is considered one of the finest specimens of the domestic architecture of the Tudors. It was purchased by Mr. Sparrowe, and has been inhabited by the Sparrowes for nearly three centuries without interruption. In this house, according to tradition, Charles II. found refuge, and, as a token of gratitude, presented his host, after the Restoration, with a portrait of himself and a miniature of his father, as well as with one of Mrs. Lane. In this house George I. was entertained on one of his visits to Hanover, and acknowledged the hospitality by a full-length portrait of himself, which still adorns the house. The late Mr. Sparrowe was on several occasions chief magistrate of the borough, and likewise for many years Coroner of the county; and in all the relations of life, public or private, secured the esteem and respect of his fellow-townsmen. For many generations the Sparrowes had been interred in the family vault in St. Lawrence's Church, adjoining the old mansion-house, but Mr. Sparrowe's rest. His remains were committed to the earth in the new cemetery.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THERE is no predication on a Tuesday what will be the disposition of the House of Commons on a Wednesday; or any prophecy on Thursday how public spirit will evoke itself in the first hours of Friday. Ministers want to be bail early on the first night of the Session, under the influence of a Parliamentary nothing sprung, to find themselves surrounded at one o'clock next day by a crowd of excited independent members, each holding out his own little cup of bitter tonic, to be forced immediately on the reluctant palates of unsuspecting officials under the notion that their weak condition required a sudden administration of strengthening astringents. By a lucky chance Mr. Gladstone was present at a morning sitting, and thus escaped the infection that he at least required stimulants on the score of being wanting in vigour. Nevertheless, there was a voice of warning, coming from their own side of the House, which was probably not without its effect on Ministers, and no doubt caused whispers to be exchanged in the inmost lists of Parliamentary supporters of the Government, and to reconsider, and perhaps modify, their marks against each name, signification of yay or nay-wards, as the case may be. Such an idea was evidently at the bottom of the outburst on this occasion, which had already occurred to more than one outside observer, and that was why the Legislature had been called together at so forthright earlier than usual if all great measures were to be held in abeyance for a month to come! It is more than likely that Mr. Gladstone, who could not have been alone in the perception of this peculiarity, with his usual readiness, made his declaration in the very proximate production of the Budget, an impromptu, in order to meet the difficulty which was palpably arising; and, as he has been a good deal absent from the House since the o'clock since, he has probably been cramming three weeks' preparation into one.

Mr. Bouverie is one of the perpetual Whig office-bearers who has been crowded out of the present Ministerial programme in consequence of the coalition arrangements. There is a place vacant, which has been dangling before the eyes of aspirants for a long time, as the giving away of good things go, which would just suit this right hon. gentleman. It is just possible that it may be filled up by one of the contending claims in his favour that he made a vigorous and, truth to say, a very amusing effort to obtain for Governments in general an escape from a formidable array of badgerings which they have to encounter every Friday night on the question put by Government to it on Monday. No doubt the matter has two very decided sides: there is great convenience in the delay of Government questions to a late night, but it is clear that it is a favourable opportunity in the abstract for the bringing forward of those grievances of order and ventilation than legislative action. The real cause, however, of the tenacity with which the free lances of the House stick to the privilege is the fancy in the back of their heads that they have some compensation for the enforced silence of the two following days, while it also gives Parliamentary importance to a Government from the easy intend to spend Saturday and Sunday within speaking distance of his constituents. The dispute might well be compromised by making Thursday the Government night, and giving Friday to Mr. Locke King, simple, to the rock of membership.

It is a pity that Mr. Bright should persist in so narrowing his mind as to give up to Lancashire what was meant for mankind. How it is that he will have it is not whatever is not agitated in the two great northern counties is non-existent anywhere else. To what an extent the contracting process has operated on his ideas may be judged from the circumstance that he has given the length of protesting against the disturbance of ancient usages, provided they exist in his own district.

In the dearth of great questions during the past week there has been opportunity for the student in the gallery to observe the development of personal peculiarities of style. Mr. Lowe and Mr. Bright is a specimen. Running on in this vein, it may be remarked that the class of those gentlemen who address the public things from the admission of Jews to Parliament would be mightily allayed if the public took on at the attitude assumed by the present occupants of seats in the House by members of their constituency. As far as some steady observation has gone, we have been unable to detect the appearance in their place on any occasion of the new Rothschilds this Session. Mr. Alderman Salomons sits restlessly about the bar and lower benches on [illegible] in the evening, and has been so ever since then; while as to the last addition to the Jewish section of the House nothing can be more sad and desolate than his aspect. He creeps into the House with timid, shrinking step, and sits all night, no man consorting with him, not even the only one of his co-religionists who has been in attendance; while the strangeness appears to affect him, and the mental debate as to whether he shall wear it or not which ordinarily besets new members, is evidently appallingly distracting.

Every one knows that the name of Sir Gilbert Heathcote will own prominence in the House. There is an identity, too, about them, inasmuch as they both seem to confine their services to Wall, the one more in the deliverance of a continued protest against all and sundry that turn up in their way. But there is this difference between their effect on the House: the one never fails to impress, something in the way that a first-class melodramatic actor may be supposed to do, by his intensity, while the other never succeeds in getting beyond a second a motion without being, as Scrub says, "laughed at most consumedly." Why this is so those who are in the habit of hearing can tell; but it is a cruel sort of hunting-to-death way which the House has, and which is insane and revolting.

It may be satisfactory to the largest constituency in the kingdom to know that the talking member for the Tower Hamlets preserves in its integrity the sole sickly sweetness of his style. It is astonishing how good a speaker this honourable gentleman is, how full of point and illustration, and even of dignity, his purpose, his speeches are; and we cannot but feel sorry that he should not have a little to correct his tendency to redundancy, and a impingeness, not of utterance, but of manner, which is a sort of—we hate the word honeying, over of his style, which causes his speeches to be so clinging.

On a special occasion this week—which does not concern people out of doors much, but which was notable for an almost universal admission in the House that members cannot possibly be honest and fair in a Parliamentary sense—it was observed that a rival to Mr. Osborne in what may be called the sneering style of public speechmaking has sprung up in Captain Lucescor Vernon. This gentleman is known to be a first-rate gentleman in every respect, but one could not but be struck, on the occasion in question, with the idea that, in replying to Mr. Osborne, he was indulging his peculiar faculty. It is very good in its way; and Mr. Disraeli ought to notice and cherish the talent for this sort of thing on his side of the House which has been developed.

In the debate on the shipping interest which was initiated by Mr. Lindsay, and in which so much was talked that might have been called "bunkum," if it were not for the name, appropriate to call it "oakum," there was exhibited a feat unparalleled in the annals of talk. Any member for a great port literally speaks to the House for more than an hour, at the top of a mighty voice, without once drawing breath, and without so much emotion as would be represented by a commas. One's own breath was held in very sympathy as he rushed tempestuously along. By-the-by, nothing could be better than Mr. Milner Gibson's management of the debate on the part of the Government—it was eminently tactical and forcible at the same time.

Listening afterwards to a dissertation on the question of brevity and corruption by two gentlemen of the long robe, of more or less drawing power, and without so much emotion as would be represented by a commas. One's own breath was held in very sympathy as he rushed tempestuously along. By-the-by, nothing could be better than Mr. Milner Gibson's management of the debate on the part of the Government—it was eminently tactical and forcible at the same time.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

TURIN.

AT last there comes a gleam of light through the lowering cloud that has so long hung over the fate of Italy. England has gained the upper hand. England is in the ascendant. England, effectually aroused, and no longer the slave of a foolish terror of invasion, but confident in her own resources, and [illegible] and [illegible] free. Such is the language I have heard from more than one of those who by station and by [illegible] to speak their sentiments on this eventful crisis of their country.

There is, indeed, no other version of the late change which has come over the policy of England than that which I have already hinted to the views and arguments of our Cabinet. The fall of M. Walewski has no other significance than this. It means three or nothing. Every one in the slightest degree acquainted with the course of events in Paris is aware that M. Walewski was never the Foreign Minister of his master beyond the forms of office life and the daily duties of the bureau; but still, such is the influence of the name, that the retirement of M. Walewski—and so much is there in the agency of either promptitude or delay—is a much more serious thing than it seems. Those who enjoy more access to Kings and Kaisers—that M. Walewski possessed an amount of reputation very little in accordance with his real power or influence. At all events he possessed—so far as such a capacity could—an influence always disposed to regard England with cold ness, and ever eager to contrast some other alliance than ours. The smaller diplomatic agents, too—envoys and chargés-d'affaires of inferior note—invariably took their tone from him; so that there was a perpetual feeling of opposition to England on the part of the accredited but pronounced against them. The instructions which these agents received at home from M. Walewski himself, who doubtless knew how to temper his master's sentiments with the spirit of his own wishes.

His retirement is, then, the announcement that the Emperor will no longer be thwarted in his own personal impressions, and that his policy he adopts it shall be faithfully carried out. Now, M. Thouvenel is the man to be selected, so, for these, Napoleon call M. Persigny. All his Eastern policy was not only opposed to Lord John Russell, but to that of those who represented him at Constantinople, he became a subtle intriguant—deep in all the labyrinths of the pashas, and seeking to carry out the objects of his Government by the sap and by mining. Now, all this subtle ability and astuteness it will require all the energy and watchfulness of our English Cabinet to counteract, and to counteract it is the commandment at this time. Of course, if the Emperor means to act in a straight forward manner with us, we have no more to apprehend than about M. Thouvenel, who will be his agent and no more; still there is need of caution, for ever since M. Walewski's fall many of the broader speculators in politics have been in the habit of acting on other instructions than what they had previously received from him.

Many persons are inclined to discover a rival to Napoleon in any difference in the views of France and England regarding Italy. The question at the point at all to be long for my present limits enough that I can say there are no differences of any kind. England should take care that the nation which goes "to war for an idea should not be overcome by a hostile army, but by a force actually clear—England can have no secret object to gain by the enfranchisement of Italy from the Alps to the Adriatic.

The above letter from our Correspondent in Italy was in type last week, but was, with other articles, unavoidably deferred. The letter which follows, from the same Correspondent, was received on Tuesday last :—

TURIN.

The last week here, however actively passed by M. Cavour and his colleagues, has been for the public a mere blank. In default of actual events, the most extraordinary rumours have been afloat, and this last frail resource has failed. It is, indeed, most singular to perceive the sort of truce, the standstill, all parties in Italy have come to, and that, too, in a moment from revolutionary heat, but simply the profound conviction entertained, that he who moves now must do so to his own ruin. The Cobden Treaty, the fall of which is called in Tuscany, affect a degree of confidence in the firmness of the Emperor Napoleon, and no feature of the present aspect of their cause can inspire; but they are the result of the personal rule of the French Emperor, which draws closely the ties of the English alliance, in the event of any change in the French policy. By this confession they recognise how completely the policy of England is repressed. The Italian Cabinet, as well as the party devoted to Palmerston Cabinet the French Emperor found himself so environed by difficulties that no other course was open to him than the adoption of the English policy, and that it is the only one which at this time in France would have been to discredit the war and outrage the Italian sentiment. The Italian Cabinet, however, knows how to appreciate where would have argued false faith, and so he waited and waited, and the hour when the one great argument could prevail, and he was able to say—Let us do for Italy what we have done for ourselves is the best, but what is the best possible to be done. The restoration of the Pope to his power, and the return of his former dominions to the hands of the Pope was equally hopeless; and therefore the question arose, Was it just or right, that it not tolerated in this sense? Establish the fact of a popular will? How long must a nation live without a Government to prove it is worthy to have one?

All disturbances in the Romagna, and in the Romagna or the Duchies, assuredly it would be unjust to charge them to any impulse of the Italian people. They are the result of the system of mockery to which diplomacy has consigned them. To know how much these people have borne during the last ten months it must be remembered that the Provinces of Italy which pertains to the centre from which that party received advice and counsel. This may have been the case of Romagna, but certainly not of the Duchies of Parma and Modena. Nothing could be more unfavourable to the Italian Cabinet than the fact that the Duchies of Parma and Modena, which are the capital cities are maintained. There is no class, from the noble down to the man of the people, that is not interested in this scheme of gain. Now, this has almost totally failed them, and the distress and ruin, the bankruptcy, the depreciation of all kinds of property done so had the people been destitute of hope; but Hope carried them safely through. The Italian Cabinet has very accurately estimated this.

Ancona and the Marche cities are very great. It was only, as it were, a other day—that is, before the retirement of Walewski—that he had every reason to believe the Cadini had the support and goodwill of the Emperor. M. Pantaleo Pantaleoni was the diplomatic agent at the centre from which that party received advice and counsel. This may have been the case of Romagna, but certainly not of the Duchies of Parma and Modena. Nothing could be more unfavourable to the Italian Cabinet than the fact that the capital cities are maintained. OUT-DOOR AMUSEMENTS.

SHOOTING.

THE modern battue has been denounced by many writers as being extremely tame in comparison with such a day's shooting as our ancestors, with their double-barrelled flint-and-steel guns, were wont to have. That the present system of driving pheasants to a body of "gunners" drawn out to receive them may, in some instances, be less exciting than the old-fashioned method of beating up the game we will not deny; but there are exceptions to every rule and we have often enjoyed a battue where the fatigue of walking was as great, and the difficulty of hitting the birds quite beyond that of bygone times. Can we have better than illustrate our argument by laying before our readers an account of a day's shooting which we enjoyed in the month of October, A.D. 1825, and one we participated in A.D. 1850 in Staffordshire? Upon the former occasion the party, consisting of the noble owner of the fine ancestral hall under whose roof we were gathered, his eldest son, the late popular Baron of Marenfield, a neighbouring squire, a young Oxonian, and myself, assembled at the breakfast table at eight o'clock in the morning, and, after discussing that hearty English meal, proceeded to the gunroom that skirted the park, where we were joined by the keepers, loading a team of spaniels and a brace of terriers. Eight brace of beaters, with a man on a pony to carry the game, formed the rotinue.

Old John Tugby was the head keeper—he was called—and more than sixty years roll over his head, yet he was as hale and hearty as a man of thirty: his ruddy cheek were the picture of health; his stalwart form, his erect figure, showed no sign of decrepitude; and his eye, keen as a hawk's, was as brilliant and lustrous as ever. His dress, for the occasion was a rural Bonnemain, consisting of a Lincoln green velveteen shooting-jacket, containing a multiplicity of pockets—among others a large one, lined with leather, in which all the woodcocks, snipes, and occasionally a fine hare were to be stowed away; a silk neckloth, of no vulgar birdseye pattern, but of that plain colour termed terre verte, ornamented with a gold pin, representing the beautiful bird imported from the banks of the Ganges; a pair of leggings of the same material as the coat, dark corduroy breeches, laced boots, and cloth leggings of a drab hue, which showed off to perfection Old John's symmetrical calves, of which he was, and any man would have been, extremely proud. Tupper's hat, save and except his Sunday one, was the only part of his attire which was new to me. It was the first time I had had having upon one occasion received the contents of a barrel in a brass pot hook and eye, and I was curious to see the existence from the erring aim of a cockney sportsman; his "missus" had decided that a stronger covering was absolutely necessary to save both her husband's head and pocket, and in the interval various hunting apparel, stationery, tools, guns, brooms, hearthrugs, brushes, crockery, books, fishing-tackle, [illegible] for [illegible] pictures, books, shoes, stayladces, cottons, candlesticks, shovells, and [illegible] had been sent to the neighbouring village, an order was given to "Cheap Jack" for the hat. The crown felt hats which neither a stray shot nor a sharp thorn were likely to penetrate, and secured an immense advantage over in the shape of a double barrelled fowlingpiece, and a large stock of powder and shot, for the use of the beaters, which was one better to each "gunner," we proceeded at a steady pace through a delightfully wooded covert. The well-trained spaniels, strong in the chest and loins, very short in the leg, and with tails like pokers, and as long and courageous, not a taint of the hound in their breed, not a wild blubber, plunged in at a point distance, or pointed a partridge back for feather among them. The morning was bright and frosty, and, the game being plentiful, we soon commenced operations. As, however, in the days we now write of, no second gun was carried, and every one had to load for himself the word "ball" was given, and not a bullet was fired until we were all ready. This is, for no newsing the attack, echoed through the plantations. "Keep your line, gentlemen, keep your line!" shouted, in a stentorian voice, adding, nota bene, to the young Oxonian, "Never shoot, sir, at a pheasant rising or back for a dead or wounded hare or pheasant, for, in endeavouring to recover it, you will be sure to 'overlay' it." Which not being as now, plentiful as blackberries) the game, your life was worth to a keeper. The beaters, which is, of course, the signal. "Let 'em rise!" exclaimed he, in disgust, to the squire, who had killed "a hen," as the keepers term it, "if I catches you at that, there would have been more than one blown up." After traversing the wood, we emerged into the adjoining turnip field, in which means we got at many a bird which had run or escaped from the interior. After a few hours with the "long tails," we stopped for a quarter of an hour at a keeper's cottage, where we lunched on the game of the day to the "long bills," for John had informed us that some woodcocks had been marked down in the covert, which, being free from bares and rabbits, and close to Lipcot stream, was a likely place to find them. Bread and cheese, with a glass of old October ale, having furnished our hasty lunch, we proceeded to the spot described by the keeper, not before, to the surprise of all the party, Sir John, who was an excellent shot, had bagged a brace of pheasants, a hare, and a shorter one, and his number four shot for number seven. Such an immediate and unique proof of the efficacy of the new popular Boronet explained his motive in the following satisfactory manner, and made some of us wish we had adopted his "artful dodge." "In a strong covert," said he, "you are so dangerous, when you attempt to move your arms amidst the branches of trees, this sized gun is the handiest, but, by means of the [illegible] and [illegible] and multiplying the marksman's chance, it will be found equally efficacious with larger, especially with woodcocks, who fall at a few pellets." After a capital luncheon, the party, with renewed vigour, once more settled to the south-west—we found many of these migratory birds in the big pasturage of some extent which brook that skirted the park. Here ended our day's sport, which, upon counting our bag, was as follows:—Pheasants, 13; hares, 12; rabbits, 8; woodcocks, 6 total, 42 head.

We now follow the hero of the nursery tale, and, putting on our "seven-league boots," we transport ourself to the year 1850, and proceed from the county of Sussex to that of Staffordshire, reaching that latter county in time to see the sun rise on the top of 132 miles from London, in less than half the time it formerly took us to go 60 miles into Sussex. On the morning when the covertshooting commenced a party of seven assembled at the breakfast-room, when a meal combining the substantial qualities of the olden time with the luxuries of the present was enjoyed: no sooner was it over than an open phaeton and a couple of ponies were at the door, and, without the loss of a moment, we started to visit our nearest neighbours would call le rendezvous de chasse. There a goodly sight presented itself, in the person of the head keeper, his assistants, brave leaders, two lines of reformers, and at least sixty boys—men and youths, armed with large sticks, to act as beaters. The noble proprietor—and noble he is in every sense of the word—soon proved how competent he was to marshal this body of men; strict orders were given, which were obeyed to the letter; there was no confusion, no shouting, no anathematising; all was orderly and quiet, the coverts were thoroughly beaten; the time was kept in a manner that would not have disgraced a regiment of guards (now, of course, and there was no yelling, after the fashion of a tribe of Ojibbeway Indians, when a deer breaks cover, but a low cry, to warn the right or left, the halt, the advance, the closing in to the centre, were all executed with military precision. The sport itself was far from tame, for the woods were thick and tangled, the heath rough and uneven, and the gorse strong and prickly; the pace too, was severe, and the birds rose wild. Many a hare and rabbit jumped was announced at some rural cottage, and consisted of a variety of homely ingredients English luncheon which the most fastidious could have indulged in with as much gusto as those who had toiled during the morning. Here the party were joined by the kind and amiable lady on whose brow the coronated honours of an ancient house has fallen, accompanied by her female friends. The result of the five days' shooting, with seven guns, was—1497 pheasants, 302 hares, 731 rabbits, 17 woodcocks, 65 partridges, &c.; making a total of 2203.

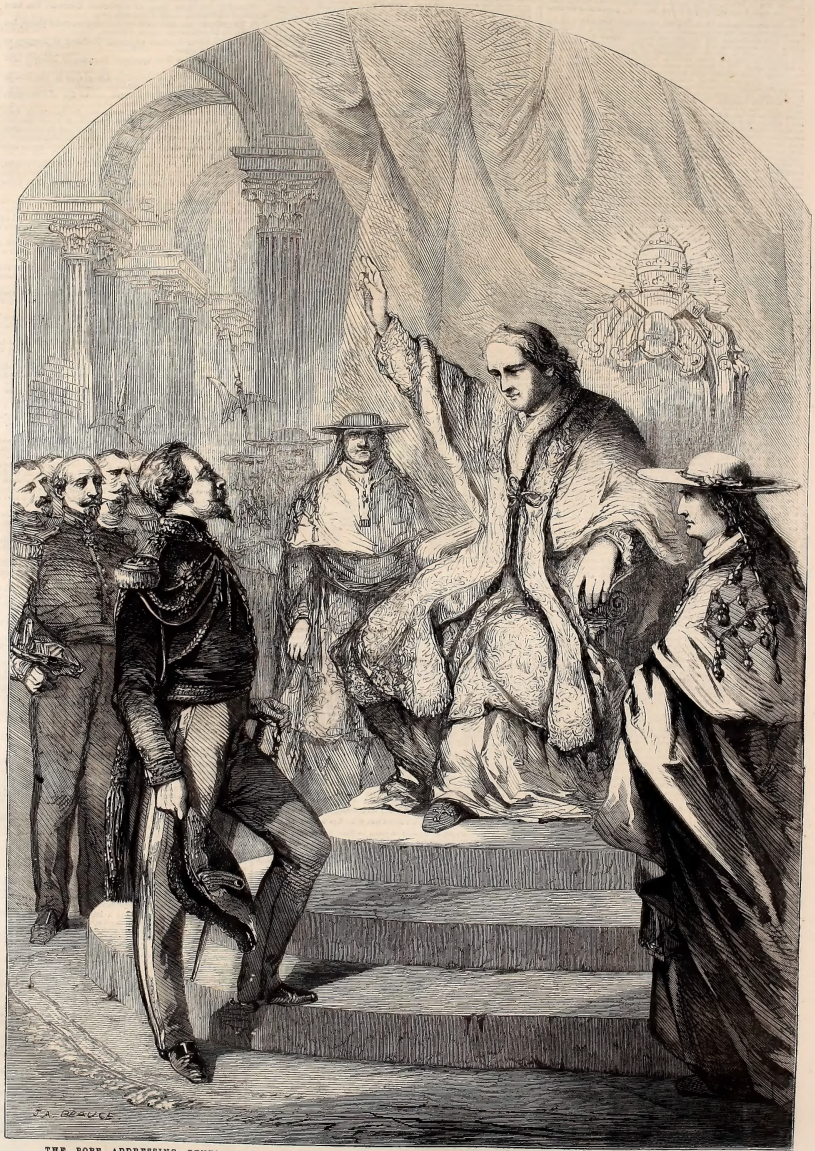
A Parliamentary paper shows that the Exchequer Bills out standing, charged on the Aids or supplies of 1860, unprovided for, amounted to £15,389,000.

CAPTAIN HARRISON.

CAPTAIN William Harrison, whose death by drowning we had the painful duty of recording last week, was the son of a captain in the merchant service, and was a native of Cumberland, having been born at Maryport in October, 1812. At an early age he displayed his predilection for a sea life. He was apprenticed to the merchant service, and even before he was out of his time was intrusted with a command. His service at the commencement of his career was principally in the West Indies and on the coast of South America. The wars then raging between the minor States on that seaboard frequently placed the vessels under his charge in juxtaposition with a formidable enemy. On more than one occasion he has been in imminent danger, but he invariably escaped, and on one occasion is said to have navigated a wholeboat more than 1000 miles. He was originally in the employ of Mr. Porter, of Liverpool, from whom he transferred his services to the great shipping-house of Barton, Erskine, and Hargreaves, for whom he commanded on the Barbadoes line, and became a universal favourite. After serving eight years in these latitudes he accepted an appointment with the Cunard Company, and commanded in succession the Acadia, Britannia, Hibernia, America, Africa, and Arabia. In these vessels he acquired that immense experience which gained for him the honourable title of the "Atlantic Navigator." Captain Harrison crossed the Atlantic so many times that he would pleasantly say, after counting up to 157, he left off "his dead reckoning." As, however, each of these vessels made from ten to fourteen voyages a year, an estimate may easily be made on the subject. While thus engaged Captain Harrison earned for himself the reputation of being the best officer in the company's employ, having uniformly accomplished his voyages in the shortest space of time, and having incurred the fewest losses. In January, 1856, he was selected, out of about two hundred competitors, for the command of the Great Eastern.

A Portrait of Captain Harrison was given in the Number of this Journal for Nov. 6, 1858. We now give another, from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company—the last photograph taken of him.

The funeral of Captain Harrison took place yesterday week at the St. James's Cemetery, Liverpool. The coffin, which was conveyed from the Lime-street station of the London and North-Western Railway at about half-past ten, was placed in an unassuming hearse, drawn by two horses, and followed by five mourning-coaches, containing the relatives of the deceased and chief mourners. The cortège was completed by about 200 gentlemen on foot (belonging to the mercantile marine of the port), and forty or fifty private carriages. The directors of the Great Eastern Company took part in the ceremonial. All along the line of procession the number of spectators was immense, and not less than 50,000 people followed the cortège to the cemetery. The flags of the different public institutions and numerous private establishments were hung half-mast high, and the church bells rang muffled peals during the day. At the cemetery the officers and seamen of her Majesty's ship Hastings, together with those of the training-ship Conway, joined the procession.



On Monday an influential meeting of gentlemen, friends of the late Captain Harrison, was held, with the sanction of the directors, at the offices of the Great Ship Company, King William-street, City. Mr. R. J. K. Campbell, chairman of the company, presided; and, in opening the proceedings, said his colleagues and himself felt they could not better discharge the duty they owed to themselves, and to the memory of one of the best of men and ablest of captains, than by cordially responding to the unanimous feeling of deep-felt sorrow which pervaded the public mind on the sad calamity which had deprived this country and the Great Eastern steam-ship of the services of so able a man. Mr. Campbell read several letters received from shareholders and others, all expressive of the deepest feelings of sympathy, and of a desire to support any memorial that might be initiated. He concluded by proposing "That this meeting has heard with profound regret of the untimely and lamented death of Captain Harrison, the late commander of the Great Eastern, and desires to convey its feelings of deep and unaffected sympathy with the bereaved widow on the occasion of the irreparable loss which she and her family have sustained." Mr. W. Jackson, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously. Viscount Eeynham, M.P., moved "That this meeting has heard with deep concern that the family of the late Captain Harrison have been left by his untimely death, through no improvidence on his part, totally unprovided for; and, considering the eminent services which Captain Harrison by his extensive experience and practical knowledge rendered to the development of ocean steam navigation, this meeting considers it desirable that these claims should be recognised by the formation of such a fund as will record in the best and most enduring manner for his widow and family the high estimation in which those services were held." Mr. T. Bold, in seconding the resolution, explained the circumstances under which, through becoming surety for a friend who had died suddenly, the savings of a long professional life had been swept away. Mr. Bold added that Captain Harrison was the support of an aged mother, and that his widow was left with three children of tender age. A committee for the purpose of obtaining contributions was appointed; and Mr. H. T. Hope, Mr. Thos. Anderson (Mayor of Liverpool), and Mr. Thomas Bold (managing director of the Great Ship Company) were appointed trustees of the fund; Mr. J. H. Dillon and Mr. John Trotman consenting to act as honorary secretaries. Subscriptions amounting to more than £1000 were announced in the room.

A WATCH—WHAT TO MAKE AND HOW TO MAKE IT.

On Friday evening, the 20th ult., a lecture was delivered in the Assembly Rooms, Station Street, Birmingham, by Mr. Alfred Allen, of Bath Street, Regt. Park, F.R.A.S., on "A Watch—What to Make and How to Make It." The chair was occupied by J. Noble, Esq., J.P., president of the Institute.

Mr. Bennett commenced by saying that he appeared before his audience at the invitation of one of the respected members for Boston, H. Ingram, Esq. That gentleman had thought his Boston friends would like to hear a little respecting the construction of that every-day necessary—the watch—and it was for the purpose of giving information on this matter that he had come down to Boston. The watch was quite a universal friend. The student knew nothing of its existence before he came; they at all familiar with anything like a correct mode of timekeeping. The public use of a steel fried in a perpendicular position, with the shadow fell at different angles at the earth revolved on its axis, placed pegs as nearly as they could at the time of noon, and the same day hence, was a great improvement on the above mode, and more perfect as a matter as far as it went—but imperfect, consisting in its requiring to be renewed every time the sand had run out. There were two exceptions at this time, namely for many days was wholly destitute of a timekeeper. From the Greeks it might have been expected that they would, following like a correct system of time-keeping, should have descended. They were skilled in the sciences; they excelled in arts; and literature had its most perfect models in existence from them. It was, therefore, perfectly natural to expect to find them possessed of a knowledge of watches; but they had not even the benefit of the sun by the Grecians. They had no watch. We certainly did hear of their having clepsydras or water clocks for regulating the time of speaking here produced, which was, to say the least of it, a barbarous mode of measuring time—although even by a Robinson Crusoe state of society, found unworthy those polished Greeks. The Romans copied their great predecessors in almost all the arts and sciences. They conquered Greece more than 140 Grecian dial, just as a dwarf sitting on the shoulders of a giant ought to be able to see further than the giant could himself (Laughter.) But with Romans as with the Greeks, we saw water again brought into use as a means of timekeeping. The Romans, however, were not quite so clever as their great models from whom their predecessors. But even theirs was a very queer species of clock or instrument for they had got some notion of the twenty hours of the day; but the exact idea as to the kind of hours they were had not clearly ascertained. Every author differed from the other. After the revolution of the earth round the sun—a fact with regard to which the Romans appear to have not coalesced with ultimate success—to be free from error. It was only a clumsy affair.

At the Saracen's arose, and with them the correct idea of a timekeeper. He looked into the works of the great Architect of the universe, and minutely observed the laws by which those works were governed. He had the advantage, too, of living after our own Bacon, from whom he had learned the value of facts. He set himself to engage in the heavens, and constructed glasses by which he viewed Jupiter and detected his satellites. Entering this branch at One page, he observed that the pendulum appeared to touch the top of the building had been disturbed, and that, as a consequence of such disturbance, it was swinging not quite in the air. He took that he spent a great deal of time in thought about the construction of a timekeeper, and, as he stood looked at the pendulum swinging, he put his finger on his pulse and found that the wagging kept equal time. He at once of that he is a law of nature, there is no timekeeper; that this motion led him to infer it to a property of the pendulum that its vibrations, no matter how the length of arc to were performed in Equal same time. Two hundred years ago Holland stood high as to its commerce but not to its sciences. There was at this period a Dutch philosopher whose name was Huygens. This man had also turned his attention to the pendulum, and soon after that time succeeded in producing a clock. Just about the same time a man named Richard Harris, in London, also brought out a clock, and a good deal of squabbling arose as to the settlement of the question. "Who really did make the first clock?" Alas Dull declared that his man was not in the clock, and the Dutchmen avowed that theirs was. It mattered, however, very little which did it; the world got the timekeeper between them that was sufficient. Having put the various wheels together, the great business was to place them in order for the use of the machine. It was a work that took half a century to perfect. It was at length accomplished by the strictest rules of art and experiment—and in 1715 Graham brought out a pendulum which worked so accurately that the clock lost only a single second in a day before his time it had been difficult to keep a pendulum equidistant in its movements, owing to the expansion by heat and contraction by cold of the metals. Graham did not better the difficulty by filling a column with mercury, thereby making the cause of the error its own cure.

The year 1715, of which he had just spoken, was a busy time; commerce was extending, and civilisation was advancing, and men were becoming dissatisfied, which, in those days, as in all before and since, was always a good sign; that supposing the cause removed, they would set to take the first man to convert the clock into a watch. His first great difficulty was how to deal with the problem of time between Greenwich and Boston or it would stop. He put in an axis and made a balance-wheel; but then he had to get rid of the weight. Some contemplate how to take off the weight and made a mainspring, and tempered it so that when wound up it tended to the same force of which was equal to the weight. There was some difficulty in making the balance and the best keep uniform time; he reverted other watch, which, action, and to obtain this end, therefore, we formulated upon a young mainspring—an elastic force—to control the whole.

In looking upon the watch it was necessary to look upon it under a meter, by which the longitude at sea was ascertained. The fifty years following year 1719 were very important ones in the history of the begin its mighty work, commerce had rapidly increased, Columbus had proved the world round, and many other great discoveries had been made against rocks—(Laughter)—as matters not very hard to bear (Renewed laughter). As commerce was increased, sailors were led to take the longitude at sea. Some men went to the Commons on the subject; but the Commons, once more in the Indies' or the Parliament, came to the decision, and that was that they knew nothing about it. Newton said, get a proper timekeeper, and that he would explain the whole business, and space was time. The Commons offered a premium for a chronometer that should be correct enough for the purpose; and in the year 1730, more than forty years' labour, succeeded in producing an instrument which, on being sent out to the West Indies and back lost only one minute in the time. He went to the Commons for the £20,000 they had offered for such an instrument; but they were shabby enough to refuse to pay him. Harrison came Mudge, Arnold, and Hornshaw. The last named found out how to overcome error in the construction of the chronometer, arising from the expansion and contraction of the metal. He found that difficulty when acted upon the balance-wheel, by compensating the brass and steel, in the proportion of seven of the former and four of the latter. From that time any difficulty in the timekeeper was to be settled by going to Hornshaw. Indeed, it had been rendered so simple by his that anyone could see to a minute's error. Even those were now himself (Rogers of Ingleby). From that moment it was no longer—Had to make, but how to make it? Mr. Bennett was the inventor of the watch. His theory was that every man who had a heart ought to have a watch. A man must be considered behind the times, a little out of the world, who was without a watch (Laughter). Well, the question was from Hornshaw's factory to make the best possible watch that was the best possible price. That was the great want, and it must be supplied; said, it would be supplied by the Birmingham people.

In 1851 the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park took place, and afforded an opportunity of all comparing our watches. We found that the Swiss brought watches which, for beauty and cheapness, filled all the English makers with astonishment. From that time we watches ever returned; the entire lot were bought up by English makers. In 1854 the French Exhibition gave another opportunity for watching the respective degrees of perfection, and again the Swiss came with productions from forty to fifty per cent cheaper than English men could produce. This led him (the lecturer) to determine upon a trip to Switzerland to ascertain how it was that they could beat the English. He found there very much wiser than he had ever been. Our grandfathers were an obstinate people—very conservative—would not change their views. The Swiss said the world wanted better watches, and they would make them. The next thing to do was to obtain the best workmen possible. That was the great want, and it must be supplied; said, it would be supplied by the Birmingham people.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.—It was arranged at the meeting of this association in Birmingham, in 1858, that every subscription to the meeting of that year should receive a copy of the "Supplement to the Chessplayer's Handbook." The work in question, it was then announced, was in the press, and would be published in a few months. Circumstances, however, of the most unavoidable character have delayed the publication of the work until the present date contemplated, and is published at 2s., the committee have determined on the following liberal arrangement, by which the subscribers will receive the work gratis and post free, which they were originally led to expect:—1. Subscribers whose contributions amount to £1 and upwards will receive a copy of the work, post free, on application to the secretary. 2. Subscribers of a single pound sterling will receive the volume gratis. 3. Subscribers who require the book to be sent to them must forward their address, together with 2d. each letter, to meet the charge of postage. All communications on the subject to be made to Mr. W. B. Wills, of 11, Waterloo street, Birmingham, within one month of the date of the present announcement, January 31st, 1860.

THE TURNER AND VERNON ROOMS AT THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

THE TURNER AND VERNON ROOMS, SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

THE magnificent bequests to the nation by Robert Vernon, Esq., and J. M. W. Turner, R.A., are now for the first time seen by the public to advantage. The pictures, for the most part, are carefully hung, although at the first glance in the second room of the Turner Collection there seems too great a sameness in the placing of subjects, each containing a clump of Turner's favourite trees. Perhaps it would be difficult to arrange them better, yet it strikes the eye as being formal. Mr. Wornum has, however, on the whole, performed an arduous duty well. Our Engraving represents a portion of one of the Turner rooms, of which there are three; a little bit of the Vernon, of which there are also three; and in the distance is seen the long gallery—a noble room—with its treasures of the British school. In our foreground we have on the left, at top, "The Battle of Trafalgar;" below, the same battle, with a view on board the Victory, the gallant Nelson wounded, and being carried to the cockpit. This was painted in 1808. On our right, at top, is "A View of Abingdon, Berks;" below is the picture of "The Goddess of Discord in the Garden of the Hesperides." The middle, right and left, is the Vernon Collection; on the left are the beautiful water-colour drawings of Turner, and on the right the various gems in oil colours. In this room there is a beautiful bust of the late Robert Vernon, presented by a number of British artists, many of great talent. Our distance is filled by the long gallery, or British school—containing Hogarth's "Marriage à la Mode," works by West, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Hilton, Copley, &c. The light in all the rooms is from the centre of the gable roof, and is certainly the best we have yet seen. The apartments generally are void of all enrichment, and, at first sight, strike the observer as looking plain.

A SCENE AT THE VATICAN ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

THE POPE ADDRESSING GENERAL GOYON.

It appears to be becoming a fashion for great personages to profit by the felicitations offered to them on the occasion of the New Year for giving expression to their antipathies, political, religious, or diplomatic. Last year we had the ominous phrase addressed to the Austrian Ambassador at the Tuileries, which was soon followed by the Italian campaign; and on the Feast of the Circumcision of the present year the Pope of Rome and of the Roman Catholic world uttered words of perhaps still greater importance, when their ultimate results are considered, at the Vatican.

The celebrated French pamphlet on the subject of "The Pope and the Congress" had already produced throughout the Roman States a profound agitation in all classes, whether lay or ecclesiastic; but it was far from being thought that the Pope would make any allusion to it in his reply to the address of congratulation offered to his Holiness by General Goyon on the occasion of the New Year, more especially as the brochure was generally understood to have appeared with the approbation of that powerful and favourite son of the Church to whom the Holy See has been under so many obligations. However, the Sovereign Pontiff, profiting by the anonymous nature of the publication, seized the opportunity for launching a fierce denunciation against the principles contained in what he was pleased to characterise as a "monster monument of hypocrisy and an ignoble tissue of contradictions." The position of General Goyon must have been a delicate and difficult one, whilst listening to this pontifical tirade, pronounced on a solemn and ceremonious occasion, in the presence of the august assemblage of Cardinals and high functionaries who surrounded the Holy Chair in the grand reception-room of the Vatican. The denunciatory passage was rendered still more remarkable by the beginning and end of the Papal allocution, which contrasted singularly with the bitter invective by the apparently sincere invocation of blessings on the French Emperor and on the French nation which they contained.

Our Artist has depicted this scene at the Vatican, with the Pope, Cardinal Antonelli, other Cardinals, the French General, and his Aides-de-Camp, &c.; and we cannot help admiring the attitude of General Goyon when listening to the rebuke intended for his Imperial Master. Whilst full of respect for the Pope in his spiritual capacity, as the venerable head of the Church of Rome, his position, with one foot on the lowest step of the Papal throne, and his hand resting on the hilt of his sword, was one of dignity and significance.

In the midst of the most powerful priesthood in the world and of the world—for they seem to cling even in the nineteenth century with an unyielding pertinacity to their temporal sway—the French General was there as the representative of the great principle of Italian liberty and Italian nationality, which the Pope, as a temporal Sovereign, has not recently seemed inclined to favour. It may be that he was to a certain extent influenced by his advisers, and that he expressed the opinion of Cardinal Antonelli and others of the Conclave rather than his own; but he is virtually responsible for his discourse, which places him in direct antagonism with the cause of Italian emancipation, so that the struggle is now become one between Pius IX. and temporal as well as spiritual domination on the one hand, against Napoleon III. and political freedom on the other.

THE NEW LUGGER-YACHT "NEW MOON."

THIS noble specimen of a lugger-yacht has lately been launched and equipped for sea by Messrs. George Tutt and Son, of Hastings, a firm of celebrity as builders of this particular class of vessel. Luggers are not common among the yachting world, and the craft in question possesses so many novelties in form and construction from the recognised lines of ordinary luggers that a short description of Lord Willoughby D'Eresby's beautiful new pleasure-boat may interest many of our readers.

The vessel in question is of 220 tons burden O.M.; length over all, 135 ft., and 128 ft. on the keel; 18 ft. 6 in. in beam; has a midship depth of 12 ft.; draws 5 ft. 6 in. fore and 11 ft. aft; and is fitted in every respect as a perfect life-boat, with air-boxes and safety-valves, her main-deck being but nine inches clear of the water line. The New Moon has a long straight bow running nearly two-thirds of her length; her greatest breadth of beam being at that point; she makes no disruption, and in the heaviest sea takes no water on board. In her first trial, off Dover, she experienced the most severe weather, burst a new mainsail, and nearly carried away her masts, without feeling more than six inches beyond her common sailing line. At her late trips, in the neighbourhood of Torbay, she has averaged from 12½ to 13 knots per hour; and her lines have been greatly admired and approved of by the most competent authorities. Her mainsail contains 1000 yards of 18-inch canvas; and she is clench-built, coppered, and copper-fastened to her water line. She has excellent deck accommodation, being fitted with benches seventy-six feet long on each side. The New Moon is also fitted with Downton's patent pumps and engine, Newbon and Smith's new anchor-lift, and every novelty proved advantageous for comfort and accommodation.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1016.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE STATE OF PARTIES.

An attempt has been for some time in operation to impress on the imaginations of the people or this country the idea that the days of political party are extinct. It is to be noted that the repetition of the phrase has been sounded most loudly from the front ranks of the section of politicians who call themselves Conservatives, and most loudly of all at the critical moments when they were exhibiting their utter inability to conserve. This has been the cuckoo cry of the leader of that body in the House of Commons when he was in office. It has been from him, when standing on the right side (in more senses than one) of the Speaker's chair, that we have learnt that liberalism is a cold word with the Whigs, an abstract passion with the Radicals, but a practical fact with the Conservatives. Practical, we have been given to understand by the same authority, because it is practicable only by means of his manipulating dexterity, and of the organisation which enables him to use his followers as a machine, while the leaders of the party which professes progress cannot get along because they are incumbered by the erratic tendencies of an undisciplined mob. It had been supposed that a deathblow had been given after the last general election to an empiricism which was tolerated in the House of Commons only because it was well known that a single move in the direction of concentration of the Liberal party would dispose of it in the short period which is occupied by a division. But it half which whispered rumour is circulating be true it is an undoubted fact that the "snake has been only scotched, not killed." The singular and really unaccountable course taken by the Government in calling Parliament together a fortnight earlier than usual for no purpose that is obvious, except to give three weeks for a process of fermentation in an unemployed and uninterested Parliament, has we are told, produced the very natural effect. The conventional tempter has, as usual, found mischief ready for idle hands, and everything indicates that once more the country is to be called upon to make a choice between those parties in the State who aspire to the rulership of affairs. Calculating on alleged or assumed internal dissensions and divisions in the existing Cabinet, founded on nothing more tangible than on an implied unpreparedness for bringing forth their measures, but which is a consequence of the Ministerial dalliance with the first three weeks of the Session, it seems that the loud protesters against their having any desire to return to power are tampering with disaffected members in the Liberal ranks, and patching up a combination which may snatch, per fas aut nefas, a hostile declaration against the Government. By the aid of that curious section of the Liberal party which engrafts sympathies with temporal despotism when administered by spiritual rulers on that commanding which is next door to license which they claim for themselves and those whom they represent, it is hoped and expected that Lord Palmerston and his colleagues will be placed in that position in the House of Commons which involves either resignation or an appeal to the country. If the information which we have received be correct, the thing has gone so far that on an early day Ministers will be called on by that unmistakable voice which cries out the relative number of "Ayes" and "Noes" to make their selection between those two courses. As far as we can see there is little doubt but that the result will be an immediate dissolution of the present Parliament. Assuming that as a fact, the question arises what is the issue on which Lord Palmerston is to go to the country?

The policy on which the present Government asks the support of the country is comprehended in political and social alliance with France, with its consequences of the enjoyment of peace by this country in the first place, and the world probably by all the world; thorough organisation of the self-defences of our land; and a Re'orm Bill of such a nature that it will prove acceptable to all parties. It is in vain to disguise that, with or without our will, the conduct of the affairs of England hinges on foreign policy. A strict adherence to an insular disregard to the state and condition of the other States of Europe is utterly inconsistent with the position of Great Britain as a great Power. It is true that we might well be content, in the abstract, with a proud reserve and dignified indifference to the contentions of Continental Powers if the elements of our power and our greatness were limited within the bounds of our geographical constitution. But, after all, this island is but the head of a vast social and political anatomy, the limbs of which are spread over the whole world, and the muscular action of which vibrates in every corner of the earth. We are essentially cosmopolitan, and our interests are coincident in some way or other with the peace and tranquility of every nation and people under the sun. This being so, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there is an influence and a Power, in Europe at least, on which depends that peace and tranquility which we believe to be essential to those great principles of human progress of which we boast ourselves to be the apostles. From time to time, and now more than ever, we have been shown that that Power, something from inclination and much from policy, desires the alliance and the goodwill of England. Since the accession of the present Government to office the relations between this country and France have assumed an "intimacy which gives the best guarantee for permanency in itself, and towards the binding of which efforts are being made on both sides for the weaving of a strong chain of mutual interests and commercial connection." Is it too much to say that, at the moment that Lord Derby's Reform Bill failed, we were verging fast towards an alliance with Austria, more or less direct, which must have involved us in differences with France, the slightest of which would have been sufficient to rouse the susceptibilities and the pride of that nation, which a better knowledge and a more extended intercourse between the two countries was calculated, and was, we believe, beginning, to extinguish. The condition of things as regards the Italian question is still very critical; and what would be likely to be the effect of the accession to office in this country of a Government that was even suspected of sympathies with Austria? Look at the tone of Lord Derby's speech delivered on Tuesday last on the subject of an alleged annexation of Savoy to France. Was it not characterised by downright scolding of the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia for suffering such an idea to have even arisen in the most secret recesses of their minds, and by something very like menace if any attempt was made at its realisation? How could the Foreign Secretary of that noble Lord commence his diplomatic intercourse with a State which he would have probably have to disavow the treaty which has been just entered into, and to explain the haughty language of his chief towards a Monarch whose goodwill he must, if he seeks it at all, seek with baited breath, and with the conscious weakness stamped on a fallen cordiality! As things stand, our present Govern ment negotiate, as the old phrase has it, as Crown to Crown—on equal terms—giving and taking; and if on our side there is any inequality it is on the side of generosity and disinterestedness. Plainly, then, we believe that the country will have to choose between Lord Derby and Austria, with all the concomitant dangers attendant on such a union of old-world principles as such an alliance involves, and Lord Palmerston and France, with that peace in Europe for which such a combination would give the surest assurance, coupled with extension of commerce, and the settlement of a thousand minor difficulties which are ever springing up when the alliance between this country and our nearest neighbour is more neutral than real.

Leaving this question, in the judicious management of which we seriously believe that the successful conduct of the affairs of this country mainly, and even primarily, depends, let us glance at another subject with which the Ministry now in office is pledged to deal forthwith. It has been currently said that there is no agitation in the country about a Reform Bill; but we will venture to assert that a desire that that question should be settled in the present Session has been very generally and decidedly expressed. That expression of feeling has taken a practical tone, for it is on all hands conceded that a measure that will cause the least antagonism of mere parties, and which will rouse no deep conflict of interests or classes, will be acceptable, and be accepted. Again, it will hardly be denied that there is not of doors a preponderance of opinion that from the lips of the present Government such a measure as we have indicated is likely to proceed, or at any rate that it is quite within the compass of their capabilities to originate and to pass such a bill as would come up to the moderate and sensible standard of public demand. The displacing of the Ministry at this moment necessarily implies one of two alternatives—the postponement once more of a Reform Bill to that modern type of the Greek kalends—next Session, or the production of one of those emanations of the romantic genius of Mr. Disraeli which have been ridiculed as fancy measures, and which have encountered that most ignominious of fates for a great political scheme—the being laughed out of life in the very first moments of their existence.

It must not, however, be forgotten that even such a course of events may not be inaugurated by the simple transference of the seals of office from one set of hands to another. Once again the country will probably be called upon to go through the ordeal of a general election in the spring of the year, with all its attendant dislocation of the current of public affairs and of private business; in fact, we shall be in a fair way of trying by experiment the soundness of Monk's plan of the Charter which makes of successive Parliaments as one of our institutions. Whether that would be a state of things which is consistent with the feelings and habits of the majority of the people of this country remains to be seen.

We believe that the time is at hand when public opinion will be called on to decide whether it will tolerate perpetual changes of Government, consequent on the assertion by narrow majorities of the House of Commons of crotchets, as distinguished from principles.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The justifications of the commercial treaty between France and England were formally arranged in Paris on Saturday. Sir John Crampton had arrived in Paris on matters connected with the proposed commercial reform in the tariffs. He had an interview with the Emperor and Monsieur Fould. The accounts from the wine markets of France describe considerable excitement, and a general disposition among the dealers to ask exaggerated prices. In brandy there has been a marked rise.

The Pope's encyclical letter was read in all the churches of the French capital on Sunday, and the Archbishop of Paris has ordered a public prayer "that his Holiness may overcome the tribulations and persecutions with which the Church is surrounded."

On Saturday last Lord Cowley visited the Ambassador of Austria, with whom he had a very long conference.

The conscription contingent for the class of 1859 is to be reduced from 140,000 to 100,000.

The Moniteur of Monday contains numerous nominations of Sardinian officers to the Legion of Honour, and announces that 2000 military medals have been granted by the French Government to Piedmontese non-officers and private soldiers; and Tuesday's Moniteur announces that the King of Sardinia, wishing to acknowledge the devotion which the French army of Italy has displayed in its expedition, has placed at the disposal of the French Government 780 crosses of the Order of Saint Maurice Lazare (the military order of Savoy), and 8000 medals for military valour.

The French Senate will hold its sittings during the coming session in the splendid apartments of the Luxembourg Palace. Preparations are now engaged in making the necessary arrangements for that purpose.

Galignani has the following:—"We are requested to state that a fancy fair, for the benefit of the British Charitable Fund, will be held at the Hôtel Continental, after Easter. Under the immediate auspices of Earl and Countess Cowley. Contributions in money or objects for sale will be thankfully received at the Hôtel, or at the British Embassy."

On Thursday week the French Academy elected a successor to the late Count de Salvandy. Thirty-five members voted, and the numbers were as follows:—Lacordaire, 21; Mazure, 7; Camille Doucet, 5; Nisard, 2. Consequently M. Lacordaire, and not M. Lacordaire was elected. [In this week's Supplement, at page 141, we give a portrait of the reverend Father.]

A grand Legitimist wedding was celebrated last Saturday at the new church of St. Clothilde, in the Faubourg St. Germain. The Baron de Rothschild was present at the ceremony. In Poitou, during the middle ages, was married to the daughter of the Marquis de Mackau, Minister of Foreign Affairs under the Republic, the Emperor as the False Prophet mentioned in the Revolation—came to Paris expressly to perform the ceremony. An imposing gathering of the fine fleur of the noble Faubourg throng around the altar.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The Spanish troops are making headway in Morocco. On the 4th inst. the Moorish camp before Tetuan was taken, after a "glorious and complete victory." Eight hundred large tents, forming the five encampments of the enemy, the artillery, camels, and all other equipage of the Kingdom of Fez, fell into the hands of the Spanish army. The brothers of the Emperor took to flight. Subsequently, as we learn by telegram from Madrid, Tetuan was taken. A summons having been transmitted to the enemy to surrender Tetuan within twenty-four hours, a deputation from the city came to the Spanish camp to beg for peace, as the city's enemies had commenced to pillage and slaughter in the town. The insolent Moors had refused to listen to any terms of opposition, and was received with manifestations of joy. Fifty cannons were found at Tetuan. Immense popular rejoicings were taking place at Madrid, which is splendidly illuminated. The acclamations are general, and preparations are being made for grant public fêtes. On the 6th inst. the Queen of Spain conferred upon the commanding Marshal O'Donnell Duke of Tetuan, and raising him to the rank of Grandee of Spain. Subsequently the Chamber of Deputies have presented their congratulations to the Queen. The ground where the victory was obtained over the Moors has been given by the Sultan to the Duke of Tetuan.

While Marshal O'Donnell was gaining this victory General Echagus, the commander-in-chief of the Spanish army, has made a successful inroad into the territory of the Anghera tribes, and to have there burned many dwellings, and captured some cattle and 200 prisoners.

The Queen, it is stated, has written to the Pope, offering him an asylum, and a palace at Madrid, if necessary.

Amongst the novelties of the season in Madrid are the new ballrooms of the English Embassy. On Thursday, the 26th inst., Mrs. Buchanan gave a ball, which was honoured by the presence of the Infanta Dona Amalia and her husband, the Prince de Barères, and the whole of the diplomatic corps, and the principal officers of various Ministries of the Spanish Government, and all the rank and fashion of Madrid—all eager to pay their tribute of respect to the Lady and Gentleman hostess.

We are glad also to mention that, owing to the perseverance of Mr. Buchanan, the numerous Protestant residents at Madrid have now an officiating resident chaplain.

ITALY.

PIEDMONT AND THE CENTRAL STATES.

Our Government made to Austria, with the consent of France, a proposal for the solution of the Italian question. This project consisted, it is said, in the following points:—1. Austria to abandon all intervention to be applied in an absolute sense; 2. Venetia to remain aside from all negotiations concerning new territorial divisions in Italy, and to continue under the Austrian flag. The inhabitants of Central Italy to be again invited to vote on their own Constitution; 3. Reserve of Austrian intervention, if demanded by Sardinia, the latter Power to be authorised to accomplish their wishes; 4. Sardinia to abstain from every measure destined to favour the annexation until the new vote of the Italian States has taken place; 5. France to withdraw her troops from Rome and from the other parts of Italy. On Wednesday the French Government received from its Ambassador at Vienna a telegram announcing that the English proposal had been received with great deference, but that Austria will never accede to the third point concerning the annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont. It is reported that Austria has declared her resolution not to abandon the basis of the agreement of Villafranca, and that, should no Congress take place, she will only negotiate with France.

The Romagnas are to send to the Sardinian Parliament seventy deputies; Tuscany will be represented by fifty-seven; whilst the members for Piedmont and Lombardy will be two hundred and sixty-six. The Italian National Assembly will, therefore, consist of three hundred and ninety-three members.

An important step towards the annexation is to be taken at the end of this week, when the Tuscan division, which is now garrisoning Bologna and some towns of Romagna, will proceed to Turin, and leave room for 18,000 Piedmontese.

The departure of the King of Sardinia for Milan has been fixed for the 15th inst.

The question of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France is still agitated, and the most opposite views are taken in the public press both as to the intentions of the ruling Powers in France and Piedmont and as to the wishes of the inhabitants of Savoy and Nice on the subject. The following number we shall give a map of these provinces.

In Rome, we are told, discontent is rife among the middle and lower classes; and the curses against the Government, which is armed with bayonets, created the present appalling distress by scaring away those foreign travellers on whom one-third of the Roman population depend for subsistence, are loud as they are deep. General Goyon is about to add to the prevailing distress by measures to the utmost verge of absurdity, and endeavouring to provoke fresh demonstrations, but without success. The Marquis de Gualtro, who replaces M. Sampayo as First Secretary to the French Embassy at Rome, arrived there on Sunday with orders from the Emperor to General Goyon to take all measures for the defence of the capital. The Times correspondent, M. Gallenga, has been expelled from Rome.

The state of things in Austrian Italy is "confusion worse confounded." Thus we learn from Venice that the commander of the army has announced that in future all crimes committed against the armed force of the State, within the districts of Venice and Trieste, will be judged by a military council; and Count Degenfeld, commander of the second corps d'armée, declares, in an order of the day, published at Verona, that from the 15th of February the whole Venetian territory, the entire province of Mantua, and the district of Trient, will be governed by martial law, as the attempts of the Italian revolutionists to excite the Austrian troops are encouraging. The Austrians are constructing four new forts round Peschiera, where a large hospital has been established. Sixty-pound cannons of large calibre have arrived at Mantua and have been placed in the fortresses of the Quadrilateral. Heavy rifled bronze cannons have been submitted for the Grand Military preparations are being made, and arrests continue everywhere.

AUSTRIA.

It is reported at Vienna that Count Colobrowski, the Minister of the Interior, cannot agree with some of his colleagues, and that a Ministerial crisis is at hand.

A letter from Vienna of the 2nd, in the New Prussian Gazette, states as positive that the Austrian Government has suspended the reduction of the army. The number of horses to Gardista, Modena, Tuscany, and the Romagna is prohibited. The Austrian military commissariat has lately sent iron ovens and a large party of bakers from Trieste to Verona.

General Hess has been pensioned. General von Benedek has been appointed Lieutenant-Field-Marshal-General in his stead.

The commissioners of the public debt publish an account of the state of the sinking fund. Its total capital amounts to 196 millions of florins, of which a nominal sum of 143 millions will be applied to the redemption of the public debt, thus saving about six millions of interest and a proportionate reduction of the public debt, save the report, will increase confidence. A sum of about forty-one millions of florins is held in reserve, Grundentlastung, 75 millions; Northern Railway Bonds, 12 million; Galician Railway Bonds, 14 millions; and Theiss Railway Bonds, 16] millions—will also be transferred to the sinking fund. Out of the above amount, the remaining 12] millions will be given to the general administration of the finances.

On Friday last Baron Vay and Baron Prony, members of the Protestant deputation from Hungary, were received by the Emperor in a long audience. His Majesty, although not willing to go a long way, their legitimate wishes will soon be satisfied. A circular of the Minister for Public Worship has been issued to the Bishops, desiring the basis of the new division, requests the Protestant superintendents in Hungary and the Wywodschaften to discuss them with the private conferences, in order that they may be officially examined and brought to a definitive decision before the convocation of the Synod.

The Emperor Francis Joseph will hold an Audience on Sunday evening in the Hungarian Theatre at Pesth, the performance of "Bakocsy's March" being then performed. The official version of the occasion, however, that order was speedily restored by a body of soldiers, and that the students of the Pesth University took no part in the demonstration.

PRUSSIA.

No change has taken place in the condition of the King during the previous week. His Majesty's strength is, however, somewhat on the increase, and allows of longer drives being taken. The Queen Regent is also desirous of returning to her Royal Residence. A soiree was held at the palace of the Prince and Princess Frederick William last Saturday, which was attended by the Prince Regent and the Princess of Prussia, and the other members of the Royal family, the Prince and Princess Frederick of the Netherlands, the Ministers of State, the diplomatic corps, and many other persons of rank.

By a recent decision of the Minister of Public Instruction, Jews are to be admitted to certain colleges and, as a necessary consequence, the oath which is taken by persons who obtain that degree is to be modified.

The Minister of the Interior has just ordered that the bastinado, as an instrument of punishment for prisoners, shall be abolished.

UNITED STATES.

The House of Representatives has yet chosen a Speaker, and the accounts from Washington show that the time when an election will be effected is quite uncertain.

Mr. Douglas, it is said, has made a long speech in the Senate for the purpose of explaining his political opinions, will probably be the Democratic candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

The alarm and anger aroused in the Southern States by the Harper's Ferry outbreak seem as great as ever, and they still recommend that a convention of delegates should meet for the purpose of considering the relations between the south and the north. President Buchanan has asked for 14,000 men of arms to be sent from the northern arsenals to Charleston, Augusta, and Baton Rouge, apparently for the purpose of arming the southern militia in case of need. A bill had passed through the Virginia Legislature appropriating 150,000 dollars to pay the expenses accruing from the Harper's Ferry insurrection.

Mr. Faulkner, the new Minister to France, has been instructed to endeavour to obtain certain changes and modifications in the treaty of commerce negotiated between the American Government and France in 1853.

The post-office and other buildings at Memphis, at well as forty-one houses, were destroyed by fire on the 27th ult.

INDIA.

The Overland Mail from Bombay brings detailed accounts of the decisive battle fought with the Wagheer tribes by Major Homer, whose force chiefly consisted of Scinde troops, about a thousand in number. He reantered and broke up the enemy, and took many hundred of them prisoners.

The Viceroy's progress had terminated at Meerut, and he was going to Simla with Lady Canning. Lord Clyde was also looking out for a house there, having abandoned his intention of resigning the Command-in-Chief of the Army at the end of this year.

CHINA.

The Chinese are strongly fortifying Pekin, and the entrance to the Peiho. One hundred thousand Tartar troops have been centred near the Peiho.

The British are energetically preparing for the coming campaign.

M. Rottwitt, the President of the Council and Minister of Justice for Denmark, was attacked with apoplexy at 5 o'clock on Wednesday evening, and died a few minutes afterwards.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) morning:—

GENOA, Thursday.—Letters from Naples of Monday last state that the Ministerial crisis still continues as the King had not given up the idea of ordering the army to pass the frontier. A revolutionary movement had broken out at Acerra, near Naples. Troops had been dispatched thither, and a state of siege proclaimed. The formation of a camp of 10,000 men at Pouille (!) was spoken of.

ANCONA, Thursday.—Yesterday another manifestation took place in the Royal Theatre at Nice. Two-thirds of the spectators were foreigners and Italians. All the members of the Royal Family, therefore, also present. Tickets and money were distributed by the Italian party, by which means disturbances were provoked. The inhabitants remained quiet. The garrison is composed of two regiments.

MADRID, Feb. 8.—Marshal O'Donnell judges it useless to pursue the Moors in the interior of the country. In the battle of the 4th instant the Spanish lost 10 officers, 58 men, killed; and 53 officers, 711 men, wounded.

COPENHAGEN, Thursday.—In consequence of the death of the Minister Rotwitt with the other members of the Cabinet have tendered their resignations which have been accepted by the King.

MARSEILLES, Thursday.—Letters received from Constantinople to the 1st inst. state that general dissatisfaction prevailed in Turkey. The complications between the subjugation of the Grand Vizier was increasing. The Dutch Minister had been insulted by a eunuch in a street in Pera, and had demanded satisfaction. The Turkish Government has promised to withdraw the paper money from circulation next month.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

TURIN.

The calm continues, and, although every one feels it t› be only a lull in the storm, the interval is not without its use to the Cabinet. Does the opening of Parliament, and the reply given by Lord Palmerston to Mr. Disraeli's question as to the joint action with France, all Italians, with that readiness to regard every event as favorable to their belief, have not assumed that the Italian difficulty had at length received its solution, and that the Congress of Paris, following, among all the embarrassments of an isolated policy, had gladly fallen back upon the line marked out by England. Such seems, it is true, many circumstances to favour this opinion, and the fall of M. Walewski appears to confirm it. You, however, without any very direct or positive evidence to shake this conviction, have been long in Italy. That there be really such certainty as they had assumed; and from the tenor of Lord Palmerston's declaration that the mutual demarcation had been come to conjointly by the two Governments.

It is a very significant fact that since the retirement of Walewski no change whatever has taken place in the tone of the French Legations in Italy. They have carefully cut the instructions of the late Minister to the letter, and it is unnecessary for me to point out to you that the object of such instructions was to oppose and prevent the annexation of Piedmont. The reactionary party, too, exhibits less discouragement than before; and, indeed, there is no move made on either side, all wears the aspect of an armed truce. Everybody says, however, that nothing will be done whatever while France consent to a strong kingdom of Sardinia! Will she, without the births of Parma, consent to the annexation of the Duchies?

When Lord John states that he does not believe that the Emperor proceed in this policy, is he not making the declaration in the sense of one who says, at least feels, the reliance upon the Emperor? certainly have no misgivings about his good faith! If it be certainly in this way that he is disposed to regard the assurances which I know others are of the same opinion with me. It would not be in keeping with the undoubted astuteness of the Emperor to relinquish finally a project that he had for years so assiduously pursued, for men whose tenure of power only depended on a Parliamentary majority; and, if he acted with such a casualty in the case of the fall of Ministry in England, the concession would be purely thrown away. I merely throw out these considerations for your own judgment—better able than I am to weigh the chances of probability—for any party at home. All our news is reduced to the state of mere gossip; and I only send you the largest of those "canards," as it is now the mode to call them. The story runs that France has agreed with Russia for the purchase of the Venetian territory for something over four hundred millions of francs, which is to pass over to Sardinia in exchange for Savoy and Nice, plus another million. Sardinia is to be constituted thereby a sub-Alpine strip of territory; and Central Italy is to constitute a new kingdom for Prince Napoleon, whose personal union with England—the object of which has been a puzzle to "own correspondents"—has been undertaken to talk over Downing street to the new policy. If not correct, it is at least not more improbable and the narrative has this much of consistency, that, as the arrangement is said to be made, the Tuileries, all the advantages are on the side of France. With Savoy, she will always have the key to Italy, for it is a principle agreed that the possession of that country by Sardinia is vital to the existence of Piedmont. The possession of the "line of the Adige," had, however, better be left to that comprehensive statesman, his soldier fears that the cession would manifest nor the operation of lithotomy; and will doubtless be solved in the same easy and convenient style.

LITERATURE.

RURAL LIFE IN BENGAL. By the Author of "Anglo-Indian Domestic Life." W. Thacker and Co.

This work consists of a series of letters from an artist in India to his sisters in England, and are intended to be illustrative, both in writing and pictorially, of Anglo-Indian suburban life, more particularly in connection with the planter and peasantry, the varied produce of the soil and seasons, is accompanied by copious details of the culture and manufacture of indigo. On inquiring of those whose personal experience enables them to judge of the merits of this book as a descriptive narrative, we were informed that it is characterised by an admirable fidelity. It is evidently produced by a perceptive observer of what he saw, and who is also enabled to give an air of reality to that which he describes. In reading this volume it must be recollected that most of the letters were written five years ago, and before the mutiny in India. It is not to be supposed that the work contains many political or personal allusions, as an accompaniment to the engravings. Social questions, and especially those connected with the labouring classes of India, are considered and discussed in a philanthropic and still in a practical spirit. Above all, the book deals with a phase of Indian life which somehow is rather more ignored than it ought to be—namely, the independent life of a number of English settlers who are cultivators of the soil, and who are quietly, but steadily and this covenanted civil service of the Government of our Eastern Empire. It is not, perhaps, too much to say that the time may come when we may owe the preservation of that empire as much, if not more, to this class as to the military and civil services, between whom it is hidden, if not crushed.

THE MAGAZINES.

The Cornhill.—In proportion to the success of the first number of a periodical is the responsibility attached to the production of the second. Unqualified faith has rejected a little by reason, and the chances are that stern criticism may take the place of admiration, almost supposing the admiration to be more or less factitious. On the whole, the Cornhill Magazine has stood the test. The second number, considered from the necessarily calmer point of view with which it will be read, may be said to be as good as the first. Expectation is probably more jaded, and the novelty, therefore, is equal to the occasion. It may be permitted, however, to remark that this serial is already stamped with a characteristic which attached and still attaches to the periodicals which have been of late years conducted by Mr. Charles Dickens. Almost every contributor has, whether unconsciously or not, fallen into the very trick of Mr. Dickens' style; and a recent publication of a collection of articles from Household Words has shown to what an extent this voluntary or involuntary imitation, as the case may be, has been carried in the instance of a single collaborateur. No one knows better than the editor of this magazine how easy or how difficult is the exercise of mimetic power as regards style and manner of authorship; and it is probable that no one is more likely to object in the abstract to the process of emulating the Cornhill with Thackeryism than Mr. Thackeray himself. In a work of this sort we look for that variety and succession of flavours which are associated with the notion of a French dinner; and we do not expect a surfeit of cucumber, partridge, with only a difference of piquancy in the sauce. When it is said that it has been found necessary to contradict in the newspapers a statement that one of the articles in the present number was written by Mr. Thackeray, and to give the name of the actual author, and when the writer of another feels compunction enough to induce him to stay short, and half apologies for his trenching too decidedly on his literary master's pasture, the case may be admitted to be as nearly complete as possible.

If this sort of working from a model is inevitable, it may be good for the workman of the Cornhill to dwell a little on the first article in this month's number, where their exemplar may be studied with immense advantage. In the tribute to Washington Irving and Macaulay, Mr. Thackeray is so tender and so true to his feelings and impressions, and he brings the peculiarities of his style to bear so happily on his subject, that one gathers hope of an emancipation in his next from mode that people are, we will not say carping at, but talking about, in connection with his tale of "Lovel the Widower," and which we will only venture to indicate as unsatisfactory. Of the continuation of Mr. Trollope's tale we have a cognate opinion. No one denies that both stories are pleasant as far as they go; but for towards unalloyed gratification their attainment reaches is at least doubtful. The paper on "Invasion Panics" is eminently suggestive, and the anecdote gleanings from the "Cornwallis Correspondence" which it contains are strikingly illustrative of the implied argument. Few, we imagine, will question the beauty of that rich and sonorous verse in which Mr. Tennyson works out the grand moral involved in the passionate history of the Anglo-American war. Of the last contribution to contemporary history which is conveyed in the first of a series of papers on Russia in Asia, it is the pleasantest sense. it needs not to dwell more in detail on the varieties presented in a periodical which is in everybody's hands, and which floats along so cheerily on the double tide of the public and the staff of writers.

Blackwood.—The political dissertation of the month is headed "France and Italy," and the argument is directed a good deal against the supposed pacific policy of the Emperor of the French, which is declared to be inconsistent with the fact that down to the present time the energies of France have been directed towards internal improvement, but to the augmentation of her navy, coupled with such an amount of military preparation as would be utterly unjustifiable except on the hypothesis that some hostile attack is in contemplation; but, when it is stated that the Marquis of Normanby looks at the principle of non-intervention to be a mockout, something of solidity may be deducted from the reasoning of the paper. A provocative subject is dealt with in an article on "Fleets and Navies," and that of England in particular, in which it is insisted that it is a sacred duty imposed on us to transmit to the next generation a naval superiority and supremacy as intact and undoubted as that which we received in heritage. The mode in which Lord Macdonald's measures are treated is not such as to be discriminating that the paper in question seems to us the one to be most resisted in the number. An account of the Columbia River and Vancouver's Island will be found, and there is still a conciliatory spirit evinced in the treaties which insists on the "Diffusion of Taste among all Classes." Fiction is represented in three tales, and there are three sets of verses, including the dreary pretentiousness of the poem entitled "St. Stephen's." On the whole, the number is an interesting one.

Fraser.—The opening paper, "Conversing Giving up and Coming Down," is a continuation of Mons. Jean de Carro's amusing and facetious lucubrations which not equally well the quiet fireside or the lounge on the shady side of a stream in summer, which have become identified with this serial. The seat of war in Italy seems a little overdone in magazines of late; but, resting on a haughty individuality, we suppose that Fraser has a right to its say on the subject. Under the heading "The Old Corrector" Mr. Arnold returns to Mr. Collier and his Shakespeare folio of 1632, with its MS. notes, and the argument is directed by steps to the point whether the notes were published with the knowledge that they were fabrications! There is a treatise on "Representation in Practice and in Theory," by Mr. Thomas Hare, which takes the philosophical view of the question. It is, probably, too late for the propounders of the Reform Bill to take this composition as an aid to their study of the principles on which they should act; but it is worth considering by outsiders nevertheless. "Points of Views" is a kind of dissertation de omnibus rebus of the day, and is a betty; inasmuch as it is a less solemn and pedantic, vehicle of gossiping than some of the magazines have attempted to adopt. The articles this month are so numerous, including noticeable ones on "The Hague," and recent books on America, that we can only refer to the concluding paper, which, under the phrase "Why not the Lords Too?" contains a masterly argument for the reform of the House of Lords, not in the least in a detrimental sense, but with the object of doing something towards the positive restoration to an actual place in the great council of the nation.

The Universal Review is quite up to the mark this month. The first paper, "Shepherds and Shepherdesses," and the mode in which their services and their characters, is redeemed from being a little behind hand in its careful manner in which it deals with facts, and the thoughtful yet appreciative estimate which it takes of two such men. Recurring to a specialty of this serial, on which we have before commented, there is an article on "The Monetary System and Financial Condition of India," which embraces a great deal more, and a far greater variety of subjects, connected with the organisation of our Indian Empire than would be gathered from the title. Mr. Kingsley, if he be the strong minded, practical man which he is supposed here, will probably accept the measurement of his own qualities and workings in the spirit in which it has been taken in a complimentary sense. It is an estimate at sound value, though from which the object may gain more encouragement than from a thousand adulatory poems. The fitness of things has again been consulted in charging Mr. Hannay with the review of "The

HENRI LITOLFF, THE GERMAN COMPOSER AND PIANIST.

Reliques of Father Prout," and one cannot but see at a glance the influence of a kindred spirit in every line of the paper. Having disposed in previous articles of modern fiction as evolved in novels of Bulwer and Dickens, we are favoured with a dissertation on "Peripatetic Romance," as indications of which we mention Plato's "Republic" and Swift's "Utopia." Why Poetry and Painting should never be separated, and how to make pictures out of poetry, and evoke poetry from painting, is essayed to be taught in an article called, with a singular fling at pretension, "Verbal Landscape-painting." We cannot but think that credit is due to the conductors of this review for having made the barriers of mere adulation which has swept along public opinion, ventured to make a stand and reason out their opinions. Acquirements, and political and literary stores of Macaulay. Of the justice of this characterisation a notion of him something may be gathered by the statement in the concluding paragraph, that it is a fact that such should have been regarded as a public loss is natural and just; there is no doubt that his power has been thereby deprived of much delightful amusement and much practical wisdom: but it is perhaps fortunate for his own fame that he has escaped from the history of the Georges. He could have added nothing to his reputation, and he might have taken something away. As it stands at present, there are not many to surpass it. As an orator, a critic, and an historian, he ranks higher than any other man who ever combined the three. As a writer of the English language he takes a place with those great masters who have founded schools of composition and have been followed by generations of disciples."

The Dublin Review opens with a paper on "The Question involved in the paper "On Advances towards Liberty in France" may be argued at present from a very abstract point of view, but here it is very well and suggestively done. The most prominent articles, besides, are those on the Arctic voyage of the Fox, on Victor Hugo's "Legende des Siècles," and the "Confessions" of Rousseau, with a "Verbal Criticism" upon them with which latter may be associated a paper called "My Club Table," which deals with recent current literature in this country and in France, and is not still a complete. We have here a number addition to the revolters against the autocracy of Mr. Charles Dickens. The issue which is rather on the increase, or "Short Season Tickets" has degenerated into a continuation of "Sam Slick" in general, but with the understanding of considerable dilution. There is a very good romance, "Conved the Dane," continued in the present number; and the story of "Artist and Craftsman" goes on as usual.

Colburn's New Monthly.—Thirteen articles on the titlepage is surely a guarantee for variety. There are this month no fewer than seven articles which have been begun or this serial by the advent of new and potential competitors. The papers that will first attract attention are, we think, those on "Washington Irving," "The French in Abyssinia," the interrogative article "Will there be a Congress?" and that entitled "Resources of Estates," which latter especially will repay perusal by those interested in the subject of which it treats.

Bentley.—The "Outremanche Correspondence," being the first of a series of letters from M. Victor Gouache, a French gentleman long resident in England, who is desirous of making known his opinions on current events in this country to his friends in Paris, promises well; it is characteristic, and may be made comic. An incursion into Russian literature, in the shape of a taste of the quality of Saltikow in his "Russians as They Are; Drawn by One of Themselves," on the face it is taking; but we hardly think that there is much point and interest derived from the work as might be expected. Perhaps, however, Saltikow is himself dull. "Lord Elgin's Mission," "Magim's Shakspeare Papers," "Notes on the Iranian Islands," and "A Vacation Tour in Spain" are alternated with three fictions, of which that of Mr. Ainsworth is the chief.

The Constitutional Press is really vigorous in its own way. There is something to like in the outspoken assertion of opinions, and the slight bitter which accompanies the dose is stimulative, and is not unpleasant. The paper on Macaulay is every way creditable to this periodical; for of such a subject it must be most difficult to the eye of those who avow Conservative, not to say Tory, politics there is evoked a tribute to power; and to an enormous mass of him that we have seen is he more grudgingly yielded by a free than here.

Macmillan.—The treatment which Lord Macaulay receives in this serial contrasts a good deal with the almost impassioned style of other papers on the same subject. Calm, thoughtful, argumentative, and discriminating, it is a very remarkable characterisation. Those at least who have not suffered themselves to make an idol of a man who needs no attempt at apotheosis in order to obtain a fitting tribute to his genius and his character. Much interest is added to the subject in this magazine by the publication of two letters in Hannah More to Macaulay's father, and which throw a powerful light on the history of his boyhood. The next most attractive theme seems to us the paper on "Modern Female Writers," apart from the title, which is awkward, but we suppose it is intended to imply to the outside the combination of French and English authors, on which the writer dilates. If it was to be said that brilliancy was the feature of this magazine it would probably be found difficult to marshal the evidence to prove such an assertion; but it is certain that it has taken an advanced place among our periodicals, and is distinguished for an excellent selection of subjects, and for a management of them which is sensible in treatment and careful and scholarly in style.

The National.—If this periodical had no other merit (and it has many), it would gain distinction by the admirable sketches of contemporary statesmen which appear in its pages regularly from month to month, and which are done by a literary and political draughtsman. The biography, although that is hardly the exact term by which to describe the paper in question, this month is that of Mr. Cobden, which is peculiarly appropriate to the moment.

The Eclectic pursues that steady, sensible course which always characterises it; and it has the merit of being true to its avowed vocation. The present number is a good one.

The Art Journal.—The first page engraving in this twin record of art and literature is from a picture in the Royal Collection by H. Le Jeune, engraved by G. H. Jeens. The subject is Scriptural and Hebraic, and tells the story of the "Liberation of the Slaves" in the year of release under the Jewish dispensation. The lighting up of the original picture, we may add, is remarkable for brilliancy; while of the effects of the grouping the engraving speaks sufficiently intelligibly. The other large print is an engraving by J. Tourny from a picture by Carlo Maratti of "The Virgin and Child," which is in the Queen's collection at Windsor. Foley's bold and striking statue of "Caractacus" is engraved by W. Roffe for the sculpture-subject. We sometimes wonder whether the possessors of this journal are accustomed to give it its due as a literary periodical. If they do not, they ought.

One of Them.—The current number of Mr. Lever's new serial stands fast in Ireland, and is occupied by the development of a character which strikes us as admirably drawn, as far as it has gone, and of which, as well as of the continuation of the tale generally, we are gradually becoming desirous to know more. Why should not another sheet be added to each monthly number? It would fulfil the edge of appetite, while it would be more satisfying for the time.

Crockford's Clerical Directory for 1860.—This is the fifth year of the publication of this well-arranged clerical directory, which is a biographical and statistical book of reference for facts relating to the Clergy and the Church. It contains 17,500 names, in strict alphabetical order, of archbishops, bishops and Curacies; a list of the Irish clergy belonging to the Church; one of the members of the Scottish Episcopal Church; a list of the English Bishops from the Year of Our Lord 1703; and a table of each name being accompanied by full information of all that it is likely any one would wish to know who has ever had a record of this kind. In its way nothing can be more useful or better put together than this directory.

The Building News for 1859.—In a very handsome volume has been collected the numbers of the Building News for last year. As is now very generally known, the Building News is a weekly illustrated record of the progress of architecture, sculpture, painting, engineering, metropolitan improvements, sanitary reform, &c., and it is conducted in a manner which is highly creditable to all who have a hand therein. It is understood that during the present year is is intended to make an important addition to the value of the work by a supplementary publication, containing a valuable and standard architectural work. That there are machinery and talent at the command of any object we need only refer to a large engraving of the interior of All Saints' Church, Margaret-street, which appeared not long since in the pages of the Building News.

HENRI LITOLFF.

HENRI LITOLFF, who has been recently performing at the different Continental watering-places with so much éclat, is not, as his name might at first sight lead us to suppose, a native of the Rhine; his father was a Frenchman and his mother an Englishwoman. But his talents were formed and developed in Germany, where he has, doubtless, been naturalised, as he is the maître de chapelle of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

Henri Litolff must have been a series of trials and sufferings. He went to Paris very young, and married there in his eighteenth year: subsequently he became a pianoforte teacher in a small provincial town in Prussia, where his wife and children died. He was left alone to the grief and misery attendant upon his precarious means. He then attempted to live by composition in Paris, but was received with indifference. Discouraged, but not despairing, he travelled through Germany, Switzerland, and England, and Belgium, where he met with M. Fétis, who imparted the last touch to his musical talent, revived his courage, and thus enabled him to raise himself to his present eminence. In 1837, when he returned to Paris, after an absence of eighteen years, his abilities were at last appreciated by the French critics, and he was internationally received. During that period he has visited Baden-Baden, Spa, Ems, Wiesbaden, Hamburg, Vienna, Berlin, &c., and has added at each of those places fresh laurels to his artistic crown.

Among his best compositions may be cited an overture entitled "Maximilien Robespierre," full of dramatic action and sustained effort; the "Chant des Belges," which is not only a patriotic production but really a superior composition on account of its learned orchestration and magnificent harmony; and the "Concerto Symphonique No. 4," one of the most original and grandiose compositions of Henri Litolff's genius. His style of execution on the piano is wonderful, animating and dazzling his auditors. His playing is of no particular school; he has no regular system; and the great Serlon has said of him that he possesses at the same time science, inspiration, and good sense.

"FOLLY AND HER LITTLE FRIENDS."

THE tractability, amiability, and intelligence of the Newfoundland dog are well known, and display themselves in a variety of ways. Deprived of their favourite element, the water, they will, for want of better occupation and amusement, bestow their attention upon beings of an opposite order in creation, even the birds of the air. A correspondent in Sweden sends us a pleasing illustration of this in a Sketch of his favourite female dog "Folly," who has secured the confidence and friendship of a large flock of doves, her neighbours, to such an extent that the most familiar relations have been established between them; the graceful birds hovering about her, eating out of a basket which she holds in her mouth, and drinking and bathing in a pan of water beneath her very nose. Sometimes they pounce down upon their good-natured friend so suddenly and in such numbers as almost to smother her. This is a pretty little episode to add to many others in the history of the canine tribe.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1859.

THE Budget—for which every one was looking with a certain impatience, although the nature of its financial contents was tolerably well known—was to have been produced on Monday night. But on the previous day it became rather widely circulated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been laid up with a throat affection. Next morning came the formal announcement that Mr. Gladstone was in no condition to make a speech, and in the House of Commons the same evening Lord Palmerston postponed the statement until Friday. From the early portion of our impression, therefore, any account of the Budget is necessarily excluded. But, as we have said, the nature of the financial scheme is almost patent; and, though Lord John Russell felt it his duty one evening in the week to say that the commercial treaty with France could not be completely understood from what the Belgian paper gave to the world on Monday, this assertion was meant only as a piece of official decorum. The Budget is practically before the world. We believe that there actually was discussion whether the income-tax should not be raised another penny, but, unless we are misinformed, the Cabinet did not think that it had accumulated by the French treaty so vast a fund of popularity that it would be altogether prudent to exasperate the taxpaying classes by a further impost. It is quite clear that the middle classes must continue to pay this tax, with all its oppressiveness; and it is only to be hoped that the upper classes—we mean the landed proprietors—will be duly grateful for the lightness of its incidence upon them, and that the lower classes will be equally so for their total exemption. Mr. Gladstone owes the income-tax payers one of his very best speeches upon this occa sion.

The Savoy and Nice question, of course, is that of most immediate importance in foreign affairs. If the Emperor Napoleon has really made up his mind to annex these territories a serious complication will undoubtedly arise. But it is said that diplomacy has provided a very large loophole out of which ambition may retire with honour. The agreement with the King of Sardinia will, it is said, be a French province, and Nice another Budgero. England takes a resolute attitude in reference to this matter, and her press must insist on her maintaining the rights of Europe.

Pius the Ninth is not in an enviable position. His friends the French are bent upon exciting a popular commotion in Rome which shall afford an excuse for a second occupation of the slave garrison, and, perhaps, for even an increase of its numbers. But at present the Romans, though making it perfectly understood that they comprehend what is meant, are obstinately orderly and pacific, and it will be difficult, even with the aid of the mezzaille at Rome, to get up a riot on a sufficiently large scale to justify military operations. Meantime, the effect of all this is still further to exasperate the Romans against their priests of all grades; and it is to be hoped that in the interest of humanity due notice will be given by any kind of device before the soldiers are removed, as, otherwise, hatred may take a terrible revenge. The Pope continues to declare himself a martyr, and to bewail the wickedness of the age. His Holiness's last letter to the Emperor is a curious mixture of supercilious and abusive, and will be found to be effective. He still, it is said, preserves his ides of diving into the Catacomba. Facilis descensus Averni. But he will find things a good deal warmer when he comes up again to light. Meantime, he has expelled the Times' correspondent from Rome, a proceeding of rather questionable wisdom, because, in these days, the moment a regular reporter is expelled from any place whatever, twenty indignant and irregular reporters hasten with news to the journals.

At length the Spaniards have taken Tetuan, and the Queen of Spain has lost no time in creating the gallant O'Donnell Duke of Tetuan. But her Majesty, we are told, has also presented the General with the ground on which his last battle was fought. This is an elegant compliment, but we presume, a compliment only, inasmuch as it is not likely that any one will claim it of Morocco and not with the view of acquiring territory, Moorish ground is not exactly the Queen's to give. The French papers have taught the Spanish journalists to vituperate England; and it is stated that so very violent have been the terms of abuse employed in from its object prostration under the heel of Napoleon the First. Indeed, there is actual talk of castigating England as soon as the Moors shall be settled with. How fortunate that we have Armstrong guns and rifle volunteers!

Mr. Cowper, one of the office of Chief Commissioner of Works is no news; but people are glad to see Mr. Hutt put into the office vacated by Mr. Cowper. Mr. Hutt is an enlightened, able, and industrious man, and will make a good public servant.

The House of Commons has refused to let the Divorce Court be closed on Sunday. The decision is a right one, and is consonant with English principles. But something might be done to meet the only real grievance brought forward by the advocates of the change. The audience of the Court are described by the authorities as be of a very bad description, and it is not before the insolent gaze of the wet and dissolute ugly customers that you have to make her complaint on a delicate subject Surely the remedy is one for a carpenter rather than a legislator. An arrangement might be made for screening witnesses from all eyes but those of the judge and jury. Sir Alan Johnson's ingenious hint for the abolition of church rates has been carried, but by a much smaller majority (29) than heretofore, and will, probably, not be the settlement of the question. There is little else to mention of the House of Commons, except that we have had no important, except that the Government make the most helpless answers about the ruffianism in St. George's-in-the-East, and Sir G. C. Lewis does not think that tearing down rails, flinging cushions, hurling bibles and prayer-books about the church, yelling howling, and otherwise disturbing the whole service ought to be called "outrages." The business gets worse and worse weekly, and the end will be that the police will have to make severe examples, with the aid of their batons, and then the church will have to be shut up for a sort of Pusseyite quarantine.

The venerable Bishop of Rochester has been seriously indisposed during the last fortnight. The Bishop has been removed to his town residence in Chester-square, and since Friday week his condition has been precarious. On Sunday prayers were offered for his recovery in many of the parish churches of the Diocese.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have granted a sum of £15,800 for the reparation of Worcester Cathedral, and £800 a year will henceforth be set apart for the same purpose. The work of restoration will be actively commenced in the course of a few weeks.

A testimonial of respect and esteem, consisting of a very elegant bibli letstand, has been presented by his colleagues to Mr. R. R. Peyerman, who for thirty years has filled the arduous office of treasurer's clerk to the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

The Rev. W. D. Maclagan has been appointed organising secretary to the London Diocesan Church-building Society.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE.

On Saturday the Prince of Orange met a large party of the aristocracy at dinner at his residence, Portland-place, and on Sunday he left town. On Sunday his Royal Highness attended Divine service at the Dutch church in Austin-friars. On Monday the Prince paid a visit to the Duke of Cambridge, and inspected the Armstrong gun manufactory, taking Greenwich Hospital on his return to London. His Royal Highness was present at a performance at the French Ambassador. On Tuesday the Prince dined with Lord and Lady John Russell. On Wednesday he left Buckingham Palace, by way of London, the Bank of England, the Electric Telegraph Company's station, and the Mansion House, and dined with Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston in the evening.

The Prince of Wales was out with the South Oxfordshire Hounds yesterday week. His Royal Highness rode well and boldly, and his appearance in the field excited much great interest.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Mr. W. Nichol, of Peckham, shot himself through the heart on Wednesday at the Lambeth Baths.

The Royal Victoria Yacht Club held its annual ball on Tuesday night at Wilis's Rooms. The meeting was well attended, and the festivities of the evening were kept up with much spirit. The Prince Gleichen, among whom were several well-known members of rival yacht clubs.

The following papers will be read at the meeting of the Geological Society, which takes place on Wednesday next:—"On the Fossils of some Norwegian Lakes," by F. Codrington, Esq.; F.G.S.; 2. "On the Drift and Gravels of Chesterfield," by R. C. Taylor, Esq., F.G.S. The annual meeting will be held on the 17th inst., at one o'clock.

From and after the 1st of March next the Metropolitan consolidated orders will take effect, and a considerable improvement is expected to result in the transport of the public through the City, as omnibuses will not in future be allowed to stop at the corners, as at home and abroad." The council, it is stated, are actively engaged in framing bye-laws, regulations, and orders for the great international undertaking, and we are promised "very shortly" a public announcement of the result.

SUICIDES.—An inquest was held on Monday on the body of Captain Bingham, a gentleman aged twenty-six, at his residence, Gloucester-place, Regent's Park, where he committed self-destruction on Saturday last. It was found that deceased had been for some time in a good of blood, quite dead, and there was a large wound in his left arm, and a razor lying beside him. He had formerly been a captain in the service of gentlemen in the Army. He had distinguished himself very much in the Indian campaign. He was just going to be married to a young lady, and, in addition, had an appointment waiting for him in India worth £1200 a year. The jury returned a verdict that "deceased committed suicide by cutting certain wrists in an unsound state of mind."—On the same night an inquest was held at St. George's-in-the-East Workhouse, touching the case of a woman's self-destruction by cutting his throat while on board the barque Anna, of Sunderland, lying in the London Docks. The jury returned a "verdict of "Temporary insanity."

SERVANCE ACCIDENT TO SUITS IN THE RIVER.—In consequence of a row rope breaking five vessels were nearly wrecked on Wednesday just below London-bridge. The Portuguese schooner Ferreira was being towed out of the dock, and when off the Custom-house, swung round by the current, and were drifted with considerable violence against London-bridge. The Gorey prevented her from striking, but was for the moment in danger of everything on deck but for the strength of her stern moorings. As it was, the successive shocks to which the Gorey was subjected were severe. The spring of the arch, and her stern, with wheel, &c., was cut down and smashed, besides sustaining other damage forward. The Triton was almost in a similar fix in the second arch. Her bow swung round and came in contact with the abutment of that arch, where she was brought up—the stern of the Gorey, which cut down the Triton's starboard quarter bulwarks, preventing her going under the arch. The Albion was the outside vessel, and was carried against the larboard side of the Triton. The two schooners were driven ahead in the entrance swing road, and were brought up by the abutment of the second arch, thus entirely stopping the navigation on the City side of the bridge. In the absent on Saturday they lay against London-bridge until nearly four o'clock. As soon as the tide ebbed the tugs came up and assisted in extricating the vessels.

PROPOSED MEMORIAL OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—There is reason to believe the long-talked-of memorial of the Great Exhibition of 1851 will now speedily be raised. At a recent meeting of the general committee—Alderman Challis in the chair—a report was read containing an negotiations were on foot for erecting a monument on the land belonging to the Commissioners for the Great Ex.-ibition which has been given up to the Horticultural Society.

THE LONDON STRIKE.—THE DECLARATION ABANDONED.—At a general meeting of the Central Association of Master Builders, held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Tuesday, it was unanimously resolved—"That the objects contemplated by the declaration have now been accomplished, the further formal administration is unnecessary; that the 'suggestions of Lord Elcho, Lord Brougham, and others, in substitution for the declaration, and that it be remitted to the executive committee to take the steps necessary for giving effect to this resolution."

LONDON SOCIETY FOR TEACHING THE BLIND.—The music pupils of this valuable institution gave a performance at the school at St. John's-wood, on Monday last, before a number of their friends. The vocal performances included choruses from "The Creation," "Judas Maccabæus" and "Israel in Egypt," and solos from the same oratorios sung pianoforte solos by Mendelssohn, Mozart, Weber, and Dussek. The whole of the pieces were executed in a highly-finished manner, and gave great pleasure to a large and fashionable audience.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 1003 boys and 940 girls, in all 1943 children, were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1858-59 the average number was 1696. The deaths registered in London last week were 1289, being nearly the same as the number returned in the previous week. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1016. The deaths of eighty-nine centenarians are recorded, the two oldest of whom died at the ages of ninety-seven and ninety-nine years.

The Metropolitan Railway Company held its half-yearly meeting on Tuesday, when a report was presented and adopted, which stated that the subscription-list having been now satisfactorily filled, they will be legally entitled to receive the £200,000 on account of shares now granted by the city of London, and that the company had now available the sum of £250,000 in hand with which to carry on the works. The works have in some portions been commenced, and the engineer's report stated that in eighteen months the line would be completed and ready for traffic from the City to King's-cross, and throughout in twenty-one months.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE MISSIONS.—A meeting in aid of these missions to Central Africa was held on Thursday last at William's Rooms, which was presided over by the Bishop of London. The Bishops of Natal and Oxford addressed the meeting in favour of the object of the mission, which is to act in conjunction with Dr. Livingstone, to Christianise the natives of Africa, and to put down slavery by commencing the growth of cotton. Resolutions in favour of the object of the meeting having been agreed to, a collection having been made for the funds of the chairman, the meeting separated.

ARCHITECTURAL ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—The very interesting exhibition of this society, in Conduit-street, was opened on Wednesday with complete success, and numerous visitors have been attracted by the varied display of more than five hundred beautiful works of art, both ancient and modern, that have been collected here. In the evening a sort of conversazione took place in the rooms, Professor Cockerell presiding; and an explanatory address was delivered by him on the study of architecture, and to the periods of both ancient and modern European history, illustrated by the attractive exhibition upon the walls, was delivered by Professor Donaldson.

WESTMINSTER NEW PALACE.—It appears from a Parliamentary paper that it has been issued that the sum expended on the building, lighting, and ventilating of the new Palace at Westminster, from the commencement to the 31st of December, amounts to £1,000,000 sterling. This amount includes the cost of the additional site, but does not include, first, the cost of the foundations of the buildings; secondly, the fittings and statuary; secondly, the expenditure for maintenance and repairs of the building; and thirdly, the cost of the apparatus for the lighting and ventilating since these services came under the management of the Board of Works.

SOLDIERS' RELIEF.—At the Guildhall, Westminster, on Monday, two young gentlemen, named Dupont and Chesterton, were charged with "for unlawfully and maliciously assaulting and inflicting grievous bodily harm" upon two soldiers. The assault was committed at Kingsbridge on the 15th of January. Both the soldiers were in plain clothes, their conduct was of the most disgraceful character, and the savage, drunken fellows rushed into a crowd which had collected in the street, and beat the inoffensive soldiers in a most cowardly manner, and when the police interfered fought and kicked desperately. They were found guilty, and sentenced to hard labour for one year.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."—At the adjourned meeting of the Great Ship Company, held on Tuesday, the report of the committee of investigation was unanimously adopted. Without, therefore, entering or even stating from blame any individual connected with the management of the company, the committee recommended a complete change in the directors, and that for the future the number of the board should not exceed seven members. The new directors are the Right Hon. Milner Gibson, M.P., Chairman; Capt. R.N., Mr. S. Baker, Mr. Hope, Mr. Croskey, Captain Mangles, and Mr. D. Gooch; and the power has been conferred to raise £50,000 by means of new ship for sea; and, should they think it advisable, an additional sum to pay off the existing mortgage. A complimentary vote was passed with the widow and the mother of the late Captain Harrison was unanimously passed.

LORD CLIFDEN AND MR. E. R. CLARE.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, yesterday week, an action was brought by Mr. E R. Clare, the well-known turfite, upon a bill of exchange, dated the 16th of January, 1855, drawn by the Hon. Francis Villiers, and accepted and indorsed by Lord Clifden, for the sum of £2000. Lord Clifden and Mr. Villiers were formerly on intimate terms and kept racehorses together. It appears also that Mr. Clare, for the sum of £2000, had been compelled to pay, and upon this occasion it ore was no doubt the plaintiff gave £1850 for the bill in question. Mr. Villiers is alleged to have played in consequence of heavy loans on the turf, and it was previously to his leaving that he drew the bill which was accepted by himself, but not by Lord Clifden, and stated that he was quite sure the acceptance was not in his handwriting, and that he had never authorised it. Lord Clifden said—"No person's bill—The plaintiff's counsel then said under the circumstances he must withdraw a juror, and a verdict was accordingly recorded.—On the same day Mr. Fawle, the plaintiff's solicitor, made an application to Mr. Bingham, at Marlborough-street Police Court, for a warrant to apprehend the Hon. Francis Villiers on a charge of forgery. The warrant was issued.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—This church was again on Sunday evening the scene of one of those disgraceful demonstrations which we are now unfortunately too familiar. A strong body of police was stationed outside the building, but the ruffians who were assembled to carry out the nefarious vist without the slightest effort being made to hold them in check. The mob congregated in the front, yelling, shouting—"No Popery!" "Hot collins!" and "Pusey's off round!" One fellow, it is stated, lighted a pipe and commenced to smoke. Another commenced to whistle, doors were closed, and orange-peel was thrown about in every direction. "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen" formed a conclusion to the disgraceful scene. Such unseemly accompaniments Divine worship was celebrated last Sunday night at St. George's-in-the-East, by the Rev. Mr. Stanton. When the police had continued about half an hour after the close of the service, a body of police entered the church and apprehended the noisy ringleaders, and a woman were taken before the magistrate at the Thames Police Court on Monday evening, charged with having been concerned in the disturbance, but the evidence was insufficient to connect them with the disgraceful outrage, and the summonses were dismissed. The magistrate remarked the impropriety of expressing his determination to inflict the severest punishment allowed by the law on all such persons against the charge of acting in the church could be substantiated in that court. The Rev. G. F. Lee, who preached at St. George's-in-the-East on Sunday evening, said—"On Sunday week I entered the pulpit, walnut-sheils, orange-peel, and small detonating crackers were thrown about me. I was struck by a walnut-shell thrown at me; and a row of boys to my left in the south gallery threaded by a man who, as I am informed, is a member of the choir, a class of persons famous for rioting, and treated with kind and liberal leniency) shot peas at my face and hands during service."

NEW SYSTEM OF NAVAL WARFARE.—A paper was read on Monday night by Captain Wheatley, R.N., at the United Service Institution, on "A New System of Naval Warfare by Means of Ships of War and Aerostatic Vessels." The plan proposed by Captain Wheatley is to propel a large steam-vessel of the Leviathan class of ship, of the character of large gun-boats, each carrying two guns of large calibre. Each of these vessels would have in tow two ships the flat-bottomed class of the Indian seas, which are built very fine fore and aft, and reasable in a heavy sea. Each vessel would have a balloon of the size of the ship of this class, of 1800 or 2000 tons burden, he proposes to propel with paddle and screw combined, and to arm with two guns of the calibre of 10 inches, carrying a round solid shot weighing upwards of 400lb., or a bolt of 1000lb., to be propelled by a charge of 70lb. of powder. The fore and aft parts of the ships are to be coated with plates of iron of sufficient thickness to resist common shot, which would rebound from the sloping bows without penetrating. Six of these smaller ships, Captain Wheatley said, would be more than a match for three times the number of three-deckers or large frigates; and, even allowing the latter to have greater speed, they could be inevitably destroyed before they could come to close quarters with the fore-and-afters, which during the chase would always have their guns on the broadside with most advantage on the enemy, whilst the latter would be unable to fire any of their heavy guns.

ENCAMPMENT AT GIBRALTAR OF FUGITIVE JEWS FROM MOROCCO.

THE JEWISH ENCAMPMENT AT GIBRALTAR.

ACCOUNTS have appeared from time to time in this Journal of the barbarous treatment by Mohammedans of several Jews in Morocco, of the terror struck thereby into the entire Jewish community living in that country, and of their consequent flight en masse to Europe as their only means of safety. They embarked by hundreds at the different Moorish ports, arriving at Gibraltar and on the coast of Spain in a state of utter destitution. Many of the fugitives, including young women and children, had no resting-place but the bare ground, and not even food to eat. A committee of the Jewish residents at Gibraltar was at once formed to relieve as far as practicable this vast amount of suffering, and their efforts were actively aided by the Christian community of that town, headed by his Excellency the Governor, Sir William Codrington. An energetic appeal on behalf of these unfortunate fugitives has been promptly and heartily responded to not only by the Jews but by the benevolent of all creeds. The Governor at once caused tents to be issued for their use, and permitted them to encamp on what is termed "The Brigade Parade-ground," round which runs the racecourse. Rations of bread are also given daily by the Government to the necessitous in camp, amounting to about 1600. The humanity and benevolence shown by Sir W. Codrington to the unhappy Jews has given universal satisfaction, and the benevolent in far countries have sent liberal subscriptions for their relief. A Gibraltar journal recently received states that 25,000 francs had been forwarded for their relief by Baron James de Rothschild, of Paris.

We are indebted to Sergeant Harvey, of the 25th Regiment, for the Sketch of the Jewish Encampment from which our Engraving is taken.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

[The accompanying report of the proceedings in both HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT yesterday so compiled appeared in our town edition last week.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 3.

The proceedings of the House consisted of a session of little importance on Lord Cranworth's bill on the subject of endowed schools: the third reading of the Law of Property bill; and the presentation, by Earl GREY, of a petition from Shrubridge, denouncing the expedition to China, and praying for the suspension of all warlike preparations against that empire.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 3.

NEW MEMBERS.—Mr. Walker and Mr. Dent took the oath and their seats as members for the Borough of Sheffield and the West Riding.

THE "NATIONE AENATA" IN SARDINIA.—Mr. GRIFFITH asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it was true, as alleged, that a proposal had been made to diplomatic representatives of England should interfere so far in the internal concerns of the country to which he was accredited as to prevent the appointment of a president or commander to a patriotic armed association for the defence of the country, such as the intended "Nationæ Aenatæ" in Sardinia, resembling in principle our own rifle volunteers, without the knowledge or authority of his own constitutional government; and, if such was as it appeared, made it distinctly intelligible that such proceeding was entirely foreign to the tact and duties of diplomacy.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL was of opinion that the conduct of our representative on the occasion referred to was perfectly right and proper. He was glad to see the appearance in the presence of such an armed force in Sardinia would have proved dangerous to the peace of the country.

THE REFORM BILL.—Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Mr Baxter, said it was his intention to move the second reading of the Reform bill during the Parliamentary reform in Scotland and Ireland at the same time that they proceeded with the measure with regard to England.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.—Sir C. WOOD, in reply to Sir M. Farquhar, said that the distribution of Indian medals would take place in the month of the Lucknow prize-money, which was in the course of distribution, was 4l.16l.000. The computation for this amount was made by Lord Canning, and would be paid about May next.

HYDE PARK.—Mr. A. LEES directed the attention of the Government to the state of Hyde Park; and asked the First Lord of the Treasury what plan had been proposed respecting the improvement of that park since now vacant by the removal of shrubs and growing trees?—Lord PALMERSTON said there had been a great misconception as to the removal of the trees and shrubs but only been removed to make way for trees, shrubs, and flowers of a better description, and to open out the park to the ground as soon as possible.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—Mr. MAGUIRE called the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to certain statements in the Times newspaper of January 31, to the latter of the war between the Mahometan power on the east of war on the coast of Morocco, on a alleged overportod misconduct on the part of Mr. Hay, the British Minister at the Court of Fez; and asked whether any facts had come to the knowledge of the Government which would justify the belief that the Moorish Government had violated that strict neutrality which should be maintained by the official representatives of a friendly power; and whether it was the intention of the Spain and Morocco"—Mr. LIDDELL entered into a statement of facts which came to his knowledge lately connected with the war, and which went to show that the conduct of Mr. Hay was both honourable and straight-forward—Lord J. RUSSELL observed that the conduct of Mr. Hay appeared to be in respect to the war in Morocco, which conduct, he said, was creditable to him as the representative of her Majesty, as well as to his high character for impartiality.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN FRANCE.—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.

Mr. STANLEY, on behalf of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said it would be consistent with the interests of the public service to communicate to the House the correspondence which had taken place between the Office in respect to the military and naval preparations of the Emperor of the French; and also whether any communication had been received before the opening of the financial statement proposed to be made on Monday next?

Lord J. RUSSELL said he did not think that a fitting opportunity to make any statement as to the military or naval preparations of France, such as the subject would be much better discussed in Committee of Supply. He might, however, say that he had received information from Paris of the formation from our Ambassador at Paris of any extraordinary preparations for war on the part of the French people. He might also say he was encouraged that a war in which France had been engaged had only recently come to a close, and that he therefore, in hoped that that country should still possess large armaments. He might add, too, that the Government had been anxiously watching the country's Government had been exerting themselves to make the peace a permanent one with the Sardinia, in reply to our representations, had expressed her determination to do so. Our relations towards a friendly authority either with regard to the Papal States; that the Emperor of the French, so far as her Majesty's Government were aware, had not given any intimation of a wish to annex that Austria was equally undesirous of plunging again into the struggle. He might, however, say that great anxiety was felt on account of the want of reason for jealousy on the part of this country at that increase in his marine which France was at present engaged in making; and he trusted the noble Lord said he expected that the ratifications of the treaty of commerce with France would be exchanged in a week that the persons engaged in the negotiations on the part of this country had been Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden.

The Probate Administration Bill (India) was read a second time.

Mr. Gladstone, for Sir C. Wood, in reply to various questions, said that the government of India were desirous of opening the navigation of the Godavery River, but the passage of its mouth was impracticable with the Nizam, in whose territory a portion of the lands required for the construction of the work was situated. He hoped, however, that the work would remain open to the end of the financial year. There was a treaty with France for the exchange of Indian and Colonial troops, and that the Indian colonies, and every care would be taken against an abuse of that privilege.

The Newspapers Bill passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR brought in a Bill for the better Regulation and Consolidation of the Law relating to Public Worship, notwithstanding Dissent, which was read a first time.

Lord DENMAN called attention to certain returns relative to County Courts, which were granted.

RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.—In answer to Lord Vivian, Earl De GREY and RIPON, while paying the highest tribute to the volunteer forces which had been raised, explained that it would be entirely inconsistent with their character as a voluntary force for the Government to furnish the riflemen, in addition to arms and ammunition, with clothing, and to give pay to the artillery. Steps were in progress for forming the different corps into battalions, and for the further regulation of their discipline and system of drill organists.

THE CHURCH AND ANCIENT BELL.—This bill, after a few words from the Lord CHANCELLOR and Lord CRANWORTH, was read a second time.

THE FRENCH TREATY OF COMMERCE.—A conversation followed, in which the Earl of DONOUGHMORE and the Earl of DERBY urged the production to that House of the commercial treaty with France, acknowledging the postponement of the Budget; while Earl GRANVILLE and Lord MONTEAGLE maintained that it was the Government and individuals to whom it belonged prematurely a document which was so intimately connected with the proposed financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE BUDGET.—THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.—Lord PALMERSTON said, owing to the illness of Mr. Gladstone, who, he hoped, soon friend was unable to bring forward his financial statement that evening; but there was a hope that he would be able to make it on Friday. He procured the powers of speech necessary for a lengthened address by Friday—SIR J. PAKINGTON, while grateful to the right hon. gentleman for the answer asked when the commercial treaty with France would be laid on the table? —Lord PALMERSTON said he believed it was intended to produce it on Friday.

Mr. A. KINGLAKE gave notice of a motion on Tuesday, the 14th, on the subject of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

THE RIOTS AT ST. GEORGE-IN-THE-EAST.—In answer to Mr. Byng, Sir G. C. LEWIS said that there was nothing in what had taken place at the church of St. George-in-the-East which could be technically called outrage. The police were not armed with summary power to stop mere noisy demonstrations. Steps had been taken to preserve the actual public peace; beyond that he was not prepared to go. He expressed his regret that the mode of performing the service in the church in question should be such as to cause so much dissatisfaction.

THE STRAIS DUTY.—In answer to Mr. Ricardo, Lord J. RUSSELL said that an opinion had been given by the late law officers of the Crown on the subject of the Straits duce; he had referred it to the present law officers, and both concurred in saying that the only mode of dealing with the question was by buying compensation for the reversion, time, and negotiations with other States interested would be entered into on the subject.

NAVY SCHOOL SHIPS.—In answer to Mr. Horsfall, Lord C. PAGET said that a large sum was taken in the estimates for manning the Navy; and it was not thought proper to carry out at present the recommendation of the Committee on Manning, to provide training ships for boys, and to establish Greenwich for boys for the Navy.

CORONERS' FEES.—In answer to Mr. Cobbett, Sir G. C. LEWIS said he had a bill in preparation for dealing with the question of coroners' fees.

The Probate and Administration (India) bill was read a second time.

The Prisons (Scotland) Continuance Bill was read a second time.

The Newspapers Bill was read a third time and passed.

Sir W. DUNDAS obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the existing statutes relating to the registration of births, deaths, and marriages in Scotland.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.—Lord LYNDHURST called the attention of the Lord Chancellor to some technical mistakes in some of the clauses of the bill for the consolidation of the criminal law. He had, he noble and learned Lord had introduced, and said that, besides this, they contained a great amount of valuable matter. He hoped the bill would pass.

In reply said that, in reference to the latter objection, such a plan was impossible, and was entirely opposed to the principle of codification.

St. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—The Earl of DERBY called attention to the disturbances at St. George's-in-the-East, which he had, he said, witnessed in very strong terms, and asked what steps would be taken by the Government to put an end to them?—Earl GRANVILLE pointed out the high difficulties in the way of dealing with such disturbances, but said that every step had been taken by the Government to put an end to the state of things.—Lord BROUGHAM asserted that the police had ample power to interfere in these disturbances, and in the circumstances of the case he thought there were two laws in existence sufficient to meet the case. As to closing the church, he thought it was being tried without obtaining any effect.

SAVOY AND NICE.—The Marquis of NORMANBY moved that an address be presented to her Majesty, expressing the thanks of their Lordships for the gracious that her Government had made objections to the Government of France to the annexation of Savoy and Nice, and for the firmness with which they had resisted the temptation, and thanking her Majesty for having conveyed that opinion to the Government of France in terms which, while they left no room for doubt, left her Government to use their best endeavours to avert the transfer of the above-named territories to the French empire. He regretted that the ancient feeling of loyalty to the Throne of Sardinia which existed in the minds of the people of Savoy and Nice should be violated by the unwilling cession of the Alps for the purposes of legislation, or to fight for a cause in which they had no interest. The Government of France, in the annexation to France was inconsistent with the territorial settlement of Europe, and would be injurious to the interests of this country. He, for his part, could not believe that no treaty existed between Sardinia and France which would justify the latter power in the course she had taken. The cession of the King of Sardinia to sell or exchange Savoy. If the Savoyards had come to the conclusion that they preferred the French Government, the mode of obtaining redress. On the whole, the noble Earl intimated that he approved of the conduct of the Government in the course they had taken.—Earl GREY, while expressing his disapprobation of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, said that the people of this country should be forced into extremities to prevent such an occurrence; but he thought that the people of this country had a right to call on the country to avert it without having recourse to such an alternative. He believed that the people of Savoy and Nice had been induced to vote to prevent an arrangement which was pregnant with so much danger to the peace of Europe.—Lord CRANWORTH, while concurring in the address, denounced any attempt to transfer the people of Savoy from the rule of a constitutional monarch to that of a despot. He was glad to understand that the Duke of NEWCASTLE implored the House not to be led away by the fervid and impressive eloquence of the noble Earl. The annexation had been calculated to prevent a peaceable settlement of the Italian question. It was on this principle that the Government had opposed the annexation. He never thought the statement of Lord Granville was a satisfactory one, objecting, he did, to the manner in which the Treaty of Turin had been treated by the noble Earl. Such a step would be a violation of the principle of nationality which had been laid down by the Government. Government opposed the annexation of the Rhine provinces? Anxious as he was to prevent the annexation, he thought it would be unwise to adopt the course suggested to the course of negotiation.—The Earl of DERBY said that there had been no difference of opinion between Her Majesty's Ministers and the country. No one feeling with regard to the annexation of Savoy to France. Lord Granville had always spoken of Savoy as a part of Italy, and as such he carried into effect. The late Government, when they endeavoured to prevent the cession of Savoy, had endeavoured to prevent the accomplishment of a consequence of Piedmont becoming a subsidiary ally of France—namely, that a close connection with Italy which had always existed. He would not discussion of that night, expressing the unanimous feeling of that House, would tend to produce the effect of the Emperor of the French, the object which might take place in reference to this subject, and aid towards the prevention of the evils which were apprehended from the annexation, or to the discredit of the principal parties to such an arrangement, both France and Sardinia. He was glad to find that the noble Earl opposite generally declared that they were influenced by no motive but the desire to contribute towards the settlement of Italy. He concurred in the opinion of the noble Earl of the most sacred treaties, and could only be perpetuated by a deed of unscrupulous violence. Lord GRANVILLE said he had no wish to conceal that of the King of Sardinia.—Lord STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE having spoken, the Marquis of NORMANBY'S motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—In answer to Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, Lord PALMERSTON said that the statements which had appeared in France which had appeared in the newspapers was substantially correct; but he did not suppose that the treaty would be laid on the table that night.

THE QUEEN'S PRINTER.—In answer to Mr. Black, Sir G. LEWIS said that a Committee was now sitting on the subject of the office of Queen's Printer of Bibles by the Queen's printer recommended that the patent should be renewed for a limited term of years. The report of the Committee of Council of Parliament the patent had not been renewed, but the Queen's printers would continue to print the Bible as at present.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.—In answer to Lord C. Hamilton, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the Government had no intention of proposing any measure for the settlement of the affairs of Italy. That Congress had not adjourned sine die, the Government had not been informed that the Congress had met, or delay in the settlement of the affairs of Italy, and they made a proposal on the part of Austria that the Congress should meet at Zurich on the 10th inst. It was proposed that the above two Powers should not interfere in the affairs of Italy during the negotiations, and that the Austrian troops should not be withdrawn from Italy; and that there should be no interference with the rule of Austria in Venetia. To these proposals Her Majesty's Government at once. A fourth proposition was that the King of Sardinia should be asked not to send troops into Italy, and that Austria should be asked not to call on States to declare their wishes; and if there was a determination on their part for an annexation, that they should not interfere with the exercise of such a determination. This, after consideration, had been the subject of communications between the Governments of Europe, and had been received. Austria, in answer to the three first propositions, had not recognised them, but had made counter-proposals. He had no reason to think that the Austrian Government did not intend to interfere in the affairs of Italy, but would confine themselves to the defence of their own territories. In this state of things he (Lord J. Russell) thought held out good grounds for hope that a satisfactory settlement of Italian affairs might be arrived at. The same propositions had been made to Prussia and Russia. From the latter no answer had been received, but from Prussia a favourable answer had been received, but from Prussia a favourable answer, having awaited the decision of France and Sardinia.

THE DOCTARES.—In answer to Mr. Kinnaird, Lord C. PAGET said that the Navy had been consulted on the subject of the Committee of Inquiry on the economy of her Majesty's dockyards.

THE DIVORCE COURT.

Lord J. MANNERS moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable the Court of Divorce to hold its sittings with closed doors. He urged that the publicity of the proceedings in the Divorce Court was the principal cause of more injury to public morals than the improper publications of Holywell-street, but could not help thinking that the publicity of the Court was imposed as a remedy simply to give the discretion to the Judge of the Divorce Court which, unfortunately, had been exercised by the Judges of the Court of Lords when they dealt with divorce cases, by the Court of Chancery, and by the Scotch Courts of Session and Justiciary.

Mr. E. JAMES moved the previous question, on the ground that the question was one of great delicacy and importance, and that the House had not had sufficient time to consider the principle of the bill. The proposition was first from it, which has been proved to be far from the case. The proposal of the bill was to leave the question of publicity or non-publicity to the mere taste of the Judge.

Lord R. CECIL urged that this case was parallel to that in which the House had given its sanction to the suppression of obscene publications.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said that the proposal in the bill was to give a peculiar privilege to the Divorce Court, and on this ground he objected to it. Questions far more grave in their liberal description occurred in criminal courts than those which were brought forward in that Court. In such cases women and children were removed, but there was no attempt at bearing the ca se with closed doors. No case had been made out for special legislation for the Divorce Court.

Mr. MALINS opposed the granting such an unconstitutional power to any Judges as that proposed by this bill. It was a matter in which public morality was concerned that the cause of separation between husband and wife should be made known. Nothing would tend more to assist collusion in cases in the Divorce Court than sittings with closed doors.

Mr. E. MACARTAY said that the privilege was asked for, not with a view to bringing a private gratification, but in the interests of the parties to suits in the Divorce Court in certain and special cases.

On a division the bill was rejected, the numbers being—For the bill, 83; against it, 258.

CHILDREN'S ARBITRATION.—Mr. MACKINNON obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish councils of arbitration to adjust differences between masters and workmen.

WINDOW-CLEANING.—Mr. CAVE, on behalf of Sir C. Burrell, obtained leave to bring in a bill to diminish the danger incurred by persons employed in cleaning and repairing windows.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES IN WORKS.—Mr. CAVE obtained leave to bring in a bill to place the employment of women, young persons, and children in bleaching and dyeing works under the regulations of the Factory Acts.

CHARITABLE USES.—Mr. HADFIELD obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the appointment of Trustees under Wills.

AMENDMENT OF THE MARRIAGE ACTS.—Mr. MELLOR obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Marriage Acts, and to extend their provisions to the persons called Quakers.

The Select Committee on packet and telegraphic contracts was appointed. The Select Committee to inquire into the nature and extent of the Queen's private patronage, so far as relates to the printing of the Bible, was appointed. The Tramways (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

New writs were issued for the borough of Hertford, in room of the appointment of Mr. W. Cowper to the Chief Commissionership of Works; and for Gateshead, owing to the appointment of Mr. Hall to the Vice-Presidentship of the Board of Trade.

In answer to Colonel Dunne, Mr. S. HERBERT said it was intended to reappoint the Committee on Military Organisation.

ABOLITION OF CHURCH RATES.

Sir J. TREVELYAN moved the second reading of his bill for the abolition of church rates, urging the general arguments, which are well known, and proceeding to state how the amount of church rates for the year was 675,719l. The sum borrowed on the security of rates was 4313,200, the interest at which would be 17,248l. The total was 692,967l. If the bill were to take effect out of the rates, the amount required to be raised might be much reduced. The sum, indeed, had been reduced by voluntary subscriptions to 300,000l. in the last few years. The contributions of Dissenters to the rates formed a large assistance to the Church, which they were levied. The bill, if passed, would be enforcing a last exemption to Dissenters, to make the line of difference between them and the Church. The bill was not one to be carried in a hurry nor was to be scarcely perceptible? A large amount of money had been paid by the churchwardens, and in many places rates had always been refused on principle where considerable sums would have been received by voluntary contributions. The bill would not, however, affect rates, money might be obtained for the repair of the fabrics of churches; among others, by a better management of charities.

Sir C. DOUGLAS seconded the motion. He urged that all attempts at compromise of this question had failed. The bill was the present to be finally settled, and nothing remained but a measure for the entire abolition of church rates, which was loudly and unanimously demanded by the people.

Lord R. MONTAGU moved the rejection of the bill. He urged that the question had entered into the domain of party, and was no longer merely but a political question. There was direct evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords that the Dissenters did not consider payment of church rates a grievance, but were only anxious to carry out a theory of government. The question was one which affected the Church of England, for dissent did not, like the Church, minister to the poor. It was admitted that the subject was one which ought not to be agitated, but as to the subject, but to go much further against the Church, nor would the question be settled by the passing of the bill.

Mr. R. LOVE seconded the amendment, and argued his view of the subject with considerable force. He opposed the bill, though he said he was a friend, in voting for a bill similar to this last year after a long opposition to the abolition of church rates, because it was a bill of compromise.

Sir G. C. LEWIS, having vindicated Lord J. Russell from the charge of inconsistency, declared his intention of voting for the bill. He had not faith in any hope of a compromise of the question. His contended that there was a difference between the payment of rates for the poor, which was much as the former were in fact supported by voluntary contributions, and therefore church rates were not a grievance. He did not think the poor in the country there was a provision for the clergy, and therefore church rates were asked, and generally refused, in the rural districts. But he thought a general system of pew rents would be a much more satisfactory arrangement than the present system. He did not think the compensation ought to be given for the rates, which ought to be abolished, but some substitute should be provided for the poor. He should be grateful to the objects for which church rates were now levied.

Mr. E. JAMES made it a matter of complaint that this question of church rates had been suffered to remain in the hands of private members, and that the settlement of it was not undertaken by the Government; while at the same time Ministers had thrown their weight on the side of abolition, and were acting in that direction in favour of this bill, and that before the House. The only exception was that of the late Government, who, only in their terror of the Dissenters, had made it a matter of party responsibility with a view to the decision of the question. The object now sought was to prevent the people who were willing to pay a rate themselves in support of the church from doing so; but there were ulterior objects in view; for it was avowed amongst Dissenters that things that could not be attacked to follow, and, in short, the disconnection of Church and State, an object which it was the duty of the Church to fight for and open question by opposing and mining. In many parishes the clergy were dependent on church rates for subsistence, and he could not but consider the present bill as others which directed this provision.

Mr. BECKETT-DENISON seconded the bill, and that, if he believed that the cessation of church rates would cause the falling into decay of churches, he should pause before he voted for the measure. He was glad to see parishes where the rates had ceased the churches were efficiently maintained.

Mr. HADFIELD opposed the bill, and was against the bill as it had yet been urged, and that was the controlling character of the measure. He looked with great jealousy on the exercise of authority being allowed to laymen in the local administration of a custom so important as that of maintaining the fabric of the Church and the decency of its services. He thought such a satisfactory settlement of this question on equitable terms had not succeeded; but that was a matter of regret, and not to be used for any anomaly which might exist should be as a matter of course accepted. Two plea of it, divided country, and the principle of the property of the world, so it was shown no practical grievance existed; all that was left was a speculative theory. If the bill were carried, the next issue in dispute was whether it had any connection between Church and State. He considered the bill a most dangerous measure, and although it had been at length to a conclusion, but seldom on the score on which the agitation was founded; for none but the Church could provide for the poor which it was based, when they saw the effects of that policy, drew back and refused. Mr. HADFIELD then saw the present question reproduced of a similar reaction following on inquiry into facts on the reception of evidence. He believed that the Government had taken a correct perception against that religious fanaticism which had more than once been the curse of this country, and the result of the progress of the spirit of the withdrawal of the influence of that Church in the body politic of this land. He opposed the bill, which he considered to be unconstitutional on purely speculative principles, and which tended to revolutionise the parochial system of the country.

Lord FERMOY inquired why should not the institutions of the country be revolutionised if they favoured injustice and oppression? He was in favour of the bill, which was a step in the right direction.

Mr. PACKE and Mr. HUBBARD opposed and Mr. THOMPSON supported the bill, the latter gentleman expressing a hope that in committee some provision would be made for the support of the fabric of churches.

Sir J. TREVELYAN having made some observations in reply,

A division was taken, when the numbers were carried, the motion being: For the motion, 263; against it, 234; majority, 29.

The result was received with loud cheering by the Opposition, the majority in favour of the second reading last Session having been 73.

CHINA.

Mr. SETHORP FITZGERALD asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any convention had been entered into between her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French with reference to the demands to be made by both Governments on that of China, and with the view of settling the bases of the combined operations of the French and English forces in that country?

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that there was no such convention as that alluded to.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LOBELL asked the President of the Board of Trade whether any commercial treaty or treaties (other than that recently ratified) were in force between this country and France; and, if so, whether there was any objection to laying copies of the same on the table, with the date at which they were entered into?

Mr. Du CANE said that a commercial treaty had been entered into with France relating to the direct trade between the two countries. It was dated January 23, and would be laid before the House. There was also a treaty of 1854 making certain relaxations in our favour on the occasion of the repeal of the sugar duties here.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE BUDGET.—LORD PALMERSTON, in reply to Lord Henry Lennox, said he was not prepared to say positively that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to make his financial statement, which, must, nevertheless, be lengthened one, to-morrow (Friday). If the night hon. gentleman should not feel himself strong enough to undertake that duty on Friday he would ask the indulgence of the House to assent to the postponement of it to the earliest possible day. He (Lord Palmerston) hoped they would, however, be laid on the table of the House to-morrow (Hear, hear).

DYKE DYONE moved for leave to bring in a bill to make provision that, at the election of members to serve in Parliament for the city of Lincoln, the borough of Wakefield, the electors thereof should give their votes by way of ballot. A debate ensued, which resulted in a majority against the motion of 141 to 116.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

LORD PALMERSTON informed the House that he had received a communication from the Chancellor of the Exchequer stating that he had not sufficient he should be able to-morrow (Friday) to make his financial statement.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

As the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, promised on Monday, has been postponed, owing to Mr. Gladstone being laid up with cold and influenza, we give the heads of the speech which he will, it is said, with the exception of that part of it connected with the commercial treaty ratified last Saturday at Paris.

Abolition of the duty on the productions of French manufacture.

Assimilation of the duties on French wines to those on English colonial spirits. The duty on those first named is at present 15s. a gallon, on the others only 7s.; the duty on French brandy would also be reduced by 8s. per gallon.

Immediate reduction of the duty on wines to the extent of 2s. 9d. a gallon. The duty at present being 5s. 9d., the new duty will only be 3s. a gallon.

A second reduction of this duty from the 1st of April, 1861. The duty will be a minimum of 1s. and a maximum of 3s., according to the quantity of alcohol which the wine contains.

Reciprocity, as far as possible, of the duties on all other articles imported from France.

England reserves the right of allowing other nations to participate in these reductions, as well as of modifying hereafter the duties on articles imported from France, if experience should render such modifications desirable.

France on her part undertakes to make the following concessions, but none of them will take immediate effect—

Reduction of the duty on salt and coke to a level with those imposed on the same commodities of Belgian produce.

Abolition of the duty on wool and cotton yarn.

Reduction of the duty on iron and machinery.

Abolition of the prohibitions, for which all values duties not exceeding 30 per cent shall be substituted.

A special committee is engaged in Sardinia on the task of adopting a new carbine for the corps of Bersaglieri.

THE ALPS TUNNEL IN SAVOY.—The following are some details (from the Times) of the plan for the tunnel at the lowest point of the Alps on the Victor Emmanuel Railway:—"The necessary buildings for the Bardonèche part of the tunnel are nearly completed. They are very large proportions. The same works have been erected at the Modane or Savoy end, but of a totally different kind. Within the last two months, at Bardonèche, 2,000,000 bricks have been made. The boading is being driven, as we have before stated, each end by the steam engine, nearly 250 metres have thus been carried on with arch shooting to about two-thirds of that length.

THE HOSTILITIES IN CHINA.—Some further correspondence respecting the hostilities in China has been laid before Parliament. In his despatch dated 8th June, Russell instructed Mr. Bruce to avail himself of the ample spology from the Chinese Government for the treacherous attack on our forces off the Peiho, to state that when the ratifications of the treaty of Tien-tsin shall be exchanged the British Envoy shall be allowed to proceed to Pekin, if we to Tien-tsin, by the route which shall be agreed conveyed by the Chinese authorities to Pekin. Lord John Russell further intimates that the ratifications are not only indispensable as a matter of form, but necessary indemnity will be demanded by her Majesty's Government from that of China.

THE BREED OF SILKWORMS.—The Imperial Society of Acclimation at Paris has received interesting news from Count Gallenberg, who is charged by the Emperor of Austria with a mission to China to obtain, with the aid of the English and French Governments, the eggs of a species of silkworm of the eggs of a breed which never suffered from and of the silkworm of the eggs of a breed which never suffered from the disease which has proved so fatal in Europe for some years past. Count Gallenberg has already visited Pekin and Canton, and has gone to India and the other to China and Japan, in order to supply silkgrowers in Italy and Italy with the necessary eggs. The present year, similar to those that suffered them by Roman Catholic missionaries, Count Castellani succeeded in procuring, by the influence of Chinese friends, cunning the eggs of some of the most valuable eggs. Having employed none but Catholic Chinese, he was enabled to obtain all the secrets of breeding silkworms. He has now completed his studies and observations by a journey to Japan, he has returned to Europe, bringing with him blackgrain eggs, which he has sent on equal quantity to California and by North America. 100 ounces of silkworms' eggs, equal to 1,000 grains, are imported by Count Castellani, have been placed at their disposal by Count Castellani.

THE SUPPOSED PLOT.—The following is a special Washington despatch to the New York Herald, dated Jan. 23, gives the following photographic view of the proceedings of the House:—"At Washington to-day the House has conducted its theatrical performance for this week, having taken but one day's worth of proceedings for any purpose whatever. It was one of the most vulgar Billingsgate, so far as regards the wildest passions, by prominent members, that ever disgraced any deliberative body in the world. The galleries are daily appealed to in general terms by inflammatory arguments, and the daily proceedings for days past have been of a character in the House conducted that the members themselves presented more the appearance of a disorderly mob in a low pothouse than that of the most respectable deliberative body in the world; and, under the impulsive velvet of a member from Alabama, by the remark of a member from New York, the gallleries, from the example set them by the members, caught up the favor of disorder and broke out into the loudest cheers. The clerk applied to the people in the galleries to preserve order, rebuking the House at the same time for setting the example. Unless those who profess to represent the people can give better evidence that they are capable of governing themselves than they have done thus far they had better not attempt to govern others. A few more weeks of such bear-garden scenes as have been witnessed at the national Capitol will be sufficient cause for the people to rise, and, with a Cromwell at their head, drive the present disorganisers from the Capitol. The House is really no longer an election than it was six weeks ago. Mr. Sherman's speech to day utterly failed to induce Mr. Clark to withdraw his Helper resolution."

MUSIC.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S new operetta, "Romance," produced on Thursday, last week, at the Royal English Opera, Covent Garden, has met with complete success. The libretto is from the pen of Mr. Palgrave Simpson, and is a clever and lively little drama. The subject is founded on the history of the famous highwayman, Richard Turpin, though Mr. Palgrave's romance does not himself appear on the stage—the hero of the piece being a gentleman by whom Turpin is personated. This gentleman, Beauchester, as is well known, was so distinguished for his handsome person, courage, generosity, and courteous bearing towards the fair sex, that he became a sort of idol among the fashionable ladies of the time, and was the unwitting kind of hero-worship the plot of the piece is founded. A lady of quality has been smitten with the fashionable malady in consequence of the stories current about the gallant highwayman. A gentleman who aspires to her hand, and who, though as yet unknown to fame, is her, is determined to murder her brother, is invited by his friend to attempt to gain her heart by personating her favourite highwayman. He does so; but, as the plot thickens, Beauchester himself appears for attachment; and, after a series of comic and amusing scenes, the story is brought to the usual conclusion. It is enlivened by the introduction of the Mayor of York (where the scene is laid), an absurd, self-conceited functionary, who is the buffo of the piece, and his wife, a lively little woman, whose smartness contrasts well with the husband's pompous stolidity. Mr. Leslie's music is charming, though not at all in the fashionable style of the modern opera bouffe. The musical, simple character of the melodies rather reminds us of Mozart, and of our own older English composers—the Arnes, Shields, and Storaces —whose beautiful music is now, unfortunately, almost forgotten. The orchestral accompaniments are admirable, full of delicacy, variety, and judicious combination, and the whole is derived from the instrumental noises with which it is the present fashion to drown the voices on the stage. The piece has been cast with great skill. The part is intrusted to Miss Pyne, who, as Miss Louisa Pyne, in the character of the romantic heroine, acts with her usual grace and feeling, and sings delightfully. Mr. Harrison is in his best key for the means generally of a florid character. The best portions of it are in a simple, expressive style, and in these he produces a greater effect than as much in that as in the bravura. She is not, however, without opportunities of showing her vocal powers. The finale, a solo accompanied by the chorus, is a splendid example of a brilliant execution. Mr. Harrison appears to great advantage in personating the gallant highwayman, and sings his music with much spirit and expression. "Look forth, beloved maid," exhibits his finest qualities as a singer. Miss Thirlwall has a pleasant part, which she fulfils very well, as the Mayor's wife. Mr. Aynsley Cook had a good a secondo donna. Mr. Honey is admirable, both as a comedian and a singer. We may add that the local properties are very complete, and very adapted for chamber performance—namely, the two ballads, "Poor silly heart" and "Come not when I am dead," the former sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, the latter by Mr. Harrison, the duet, "When firmly I unite in friendship," sung by Miss Pyne and Miss Thirlwall, and the beautiful part-song, "Where the bee sucks." All have just been published by Messrs. Addison and Co., of Regentstreet.

At the Popular Concert of Monday last especial interest was excited by the reappearance of Miss Arabella Goddard, who had not been heard in London for nearly two years. Her absence has, consequently, was crowded to excess, and the fair pianist was received with enthusiasm. She played Dussek's sonata, "Pas Pitié," a composition which only the greatest work of Beethoven, which she has the merit of having rescued from the oblivion of more than half a century. She was, also, heard in a beautiful trio for piano and clarinet, in which she was accompanied by Mr. Lazarus. The concerted instrumental pieces were Mozart's quintet for four stringed instruments and clarinet, and Beethoven's quartet in D, op. 18. The performers were Messrs. Molique, Ries, Doyle, Piatti, and Lazarus. The singers were Mr. Sims Reeves and Miss Dolby, the former of whom sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," and the latter a pretty ballad by Mr. Henry Smart.

Mdlle. Victoria Balfe has appeared at St. Petersburg in "La Traviata" with distinguished success.

The Vocal Association will give their first subscription concert for this season on Wednesday evening next, at St. James's Hall. The performances will consist of a miscellaneous selection from Haydn's Mass and several new part-songs by Benedict, Berger, and H. Smart, with choir of 200 voices.

Miss Augusta Thomson, the young soprano who distinguished herself at the last concert of the Philharmonic Society, at Hanover Rooms, and who also made a most successful debut at the Grand Opera in Paris, about twelve months since, has just returned to London for the season.

Mr. Henry K. Morley, organist of the parish church of Great-with, gave a performance on the organ and pianoforte at Exeter Hall on Thursday evening, February 2. The artistes who appeared on this occasion were Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Land, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Arabella Goddard, and Mons. Sainton, Mr. Morley's performance on the organ, in Bach's Fugue in G minor, with such an array of talent, success was inevitable, and Mr. Morley's playing elicited enthusiastic applause. Miss Arabella Goddard's pianoforte audiences ever assembled within the walls of the Lecture Hall.

THE LATE MR. BALFE.—The late Mr. Balfe, as a pianoforte manufacturer, whose instruments are to be found in all parts of the world, and who has just died full of years and honours, was born in 1786, at Dublin, and died at Somerstebire, in the year 1772. He came thence to London at the age of seventeen or eighteen, and was for a time in the house of Messrs. Clementi, the celebrated theorist, player, and pianoforte maker in Cheapside. By great attention to his business he soon became a partner in the firm, which, Clementi and the firm then became Messrs. Clementi, Hyde, Banger, Davis, and Collard. Clementi died in 1832, and he has been well known for his charitable acts during the time he has been at the head of the firm. He was a liberal supporter there to the last benevolent institutions. Mr. Collard married early in life Miss Hyde, and has a numerous hospitality. He takes advantage of his opportunity, and is favourably received. In the midst of his bliss Miss Jones, however, is summoned to Madrid to espouse another lady, whither Donna Dolores follows him, and succeeds in breaking off the match. For this purpose she engages herself as duenna in her rival's family, and informs the bride elect that Don Juan is already married. The piece was exceedingly well acted, and proved a success.

OLYMPIC.—One of the versions of "Le Chapeau de mon Horologer," under the title of "The Clockmaker's Hat," has been revived at this theatre. The terrified housemaid is performed by Mrs. Emden, who does full justice to the conception of Madame Emile Girardin.

ST. JAMES'S.—An old piece has been revived here, too, for the purpose of introducing Miss Wyndham as the new directress of this theatre. It is named "A Bachelor of Arrats," and is from the pen of W. J. Sorrel and J. M. Langford, and originally produced at the Adelphi. Miss Wyndham personates a young maiden who is obliged to the rough wooing of the desperate cavaliers, and thus auspiciously enough inaugurates her management.

SURREY.—On Tuesday the tragedy of "Damon and Pythias" was successfully revived. The two heroes were performed by Messrs. Creswick and Ryder, the former playing the hero and Miss Thorne. The former, in her interview with her husband, was exceedingly effective, and gained deserved plaudits from a full house. Mr. Creswick's Damon was conceived, and executed with as much energy as the actor could command. But parts of this kind require more physical power than Mr. Creswick possesses. Mr. Potter, on the other hand, perhaps, threw too much muscular vigour into Pythias. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, however, the general effect was impressive, and the last scene produced great excitement.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean have had one continued ovation during their performances at Edinburgh.

THE FARM.

THE re'urn of finer weather has made field work practicable once more, and ploughing and carting have been actively proceeded with. There has been no interruption to the sowing to what was in the barley of fine quality has commanded extreme rates. The frost has, it seems, greatly diminished the stores of feeding stuff, but it is to be hoped that as a rule farmers will have many old heads sufficiently to look for) will enable farmers to get over the difficulty in finding food for live stock.

We hear that Colonel Towneley's white heifer Fidelity has unfortunately forfeited the first prize in her class at Warwick for not having had a calf before the day of showing. There is, however, no doubt that she will calve shortly. Mr. Fowler's Dairy accordingly takes the first prize, and Colonel Towneley's Pearl and Emma now stand second and third, with Vesta and Lady of Athelstane next. Mr. Eastwood's Rose, the dam of his Rosette, has taken a new heifer Meleicia calf; and Mr. Bates's Flirt, the winner of the first yearling heifer prize at Warwick, a High Sheriff heifer calf, exactly like her celebrated dam. Mr. Eastwood's Duke of Cambridge by grandsires, Frederick and Rose Knight, it has a double stain of the celebrated Barnpton Rose blood, and this has only been shown twice once—when she took first as a calf to Maid of Athelstane and Queen of the Vale, in a first-rate field of eighteen—at Northallerton; and again, when she turned first as a Maid of Athelstane, also at Warwick. These two will, no doubt, meet to finish their rubber at Canterbury, where the Duke of Cambridge's bulls where a cow and again. Victoria Regina, who accompanied Faith to Warwick, and, with the exception of a defect about the horns, struck us and many others as being perfect. Mr. Bates's two, by the way, are by "Hesperus." We believe that no herd so small as Mr. Grundy's has ever produced two such animals in a single year.

Mr. Pawlett, the well-known sheep-breeder, has been purchasing those experiments as to feeding which now form the subject of a book. Some, collected at Cheney's fed on the same articles he selected for trial, and he put a lot of eight ram hogs on each. At the end of four weeks he found the average of the lot which had been fed on beans made 14gib. of live weight, those on cotton-cake 16gib., and those on Cheney's 17gib. That 19gib. of the cost of producing the mutton in each case was 34d. per lb., 29d. per lb., and 42d. per lb. Still, damaging as this experiment seems as regards the application of Cheney's food to the Anton animals, in comparison with cheaper substances, we remember an instance in one of the Scotch breeds where a ram of this kind was by got to eat anything till it was tried with it; and from all we can hear it is most beneficial as a tonic, but not as an article of regular food. Mr. Cheney, however, announces that, in addition to the Rothamsted objectors, he has enlarged his defence pamphlet from thirty-two to sixty-four pages, which is rather alarming.

The Royal Society elected twenty-one new members at their last meeting, and sixteen more stand for election at the next. Of the recent losses seem to have been but slightly felt, as, including the Canterbury subscription of £1500, they have a current cash balance of £3634 15s. 8d. The Council, with the usual complimentary five starters for the editorship of their journal, has announced his retirement from the arduous position he has occupied with so much credit to himself and advantage to the Society, which he has managed so ably for some years; and the Birmingham Cattle Show committee advertise for a secretary "not above forty years of age, who shall have a taste for the second and subsequent ones, if he gives satisfaction. Some negotiations between the Smithfield Club and the Cattle Market and the managers of the Smithfield Cattle Show seem to have come to nothing for the present. Islington would be too far out of town to catch the shilling folks, who, after all, find the money.

Strong efforts are making to induce farmers and labourers to emigrate to France, "where every individual by hard work may become the owner of the land." The glowing prospectus adds, that "the advantages offered are without a parallel in history," and farms, with cottages and outhouses, are already built, and contain from 50 to 1000 hectares (the hectare is about 2½ acres), all in one building, which is let at from 1fr. to 2fr. per hectare, to 1000f. the hectare (25f. is about one pound sterling), comprising the country seats, churches, schools, homesteads, granaries, woods, the right of fishing and shooting, live stock, &c., in the purchase, and which are offered on credit, with every facility for payment."

THE FOUNTAINS AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—We omitted to mention last week that the two that executed the fountains placed at the entrance to the British Museum and of which we gave an Engraving. They were made at Messrs. Cochrane's foundry, Dudley, Messrs. Bell and Co., Newman-street.

During a hearing of a recent case at the Bradford West Riding Court it appeared that, out of twelve or thirteen witnesses who came from Padsey, and were summoned to Bradford to attend the Court on Easter or Christmas occurred in, and one female declared she knew nothing whatever about it, as she had no clock and had no clock.

In a letter to the Times "A Manufacturer" says that an immediate equalisation of the duties on foreign brandy and on British spirits would increase the revenue, and would be a boon to the whole consuming profit, either to the public, as consumers, or to the French distiller and merchant.

A few days ago the sale of Lord Henry Seymour's cigars took place at Hyde Park-corner, when a large advantage of purchasers was present. The bidding was spirited, no cigar being sold under ten seas, and in several instances fifty and even more when the lots were large. His Lordship had accumulated 16,000 cigars.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES FOR THE CURRENT YEAR.—These estimates, which have been looked for with great interest, were issued on Wednesday morning. The total sum required for the service is £12,902,200, being £1,076,462 in excess of the vote for the year 1859-60. The estimates provide for 44,000 officers, seamen, and boys for the fleet; 8100 for the coastguard service; 2000 for surveying, brigs, and store ships; 16,000 marines, of whom 12,000 will serve afloat and 4000 ashore; and 9000 boys, who will be placed for instruction on board training-ships. The only number of ships, including tenders, in commission on the 1st of December, 1859, was 284, being an increase of 41 upon the number in commission at the corresponding period of 1858. Of these 179 were "sea-going" ships, divided as follows:—37 steam and 3 sailing line-of-battle ships; 43 steam and 4 sailing frigates and corvettes; and 94 steam and 8 sailing "sloops, small vessels, and gun-boats."

DON NERI CORSINI, MARQUIS OF LAJATICO.

His Excellency Major-General Don Neri, one of the Princes of the house of Corsini and Marquis of Lajatico, who had been staying in London for a considerable period, discharging the duties of Special Envoy from the present Government of Tuscany, fell a victim, on the 1st of December last, to an attack of smallpox. The Marquis was the second son of the late Prince Tommaso Corsini, and was born on the 12th August, 1805. He entered the Tuscan army, in which he rose to the rank of Major-General. He had also occupied in the Tuscan State the important offices of Governor of Leghorn and Minister of War. On two remarkable occasions he played an important part in the political history of the Tuscan State—first when, twelve years ago, he recommended the Grand Duke Leopold at once to grant a Constitution; and again, on the memorable 27th of April of last year, when summoned to form a Ministry, he counselled his Sovereign to abdicate in favour of the hereditary Prince, that the latter might identify himself with the national cause. After the abandonment of his dominions by the Grand Duke, the Marquis of Lajatico repaired, as representative of Tuscan interests during the war, to the head-quarters of the Emperor Napoleon and King Victor Emmanuel, and in this character of Tuscan Commissary-General he accompanied the movements of the allied armies in the period that elapsed between the 9th of May and the signature of the peace of Villafranca. The Marquis of Lajatico did not then return to Florence, having been dispatched shortly afterwards on a diplomatic mission to the Cabinets of Paris and London. He arrived in London on the 20th July, and since that time to the day of his death—with the exception of a week during which he went to Paris to take part in the proceedings of the Tuscan deputation sent to the French Court—he was constantly engaged in discharging his duties here.

The Marquis of Lajatico was married to one of the three daughters and coheiresses of the last Florentin Marquis Rinuccini—the other two being the Marchioness Azzolino of Macerata and the Marchioness Trivulzio of Milan. By the Marchioness Eleanora, whose graces and truly domestic virtues have long endeared her not only to her own family but to the numerous friends—not a few being our own countrymen and countrywomen—resident in Florence, the Marquis of Lajatico was the father of six children, four sons and two daughters. The eldest son, the Duke of Castiglione, in whose person the great honours and possessions of the house of Corsini will centre, married not long ago a daughter of Prince Barberini, of Rome. The second son, Pier Francesco, is a Captain of Artillery in the Sardinian army, and was decorated at Conflenza for the bravery which he there displayed. The eldest daughter of the late Marquis of Lajatico is married to the only remaining son of the Marquis Farinola, of Florence; she is the granddaughter of the Marquis Gino Capponi.

On the 16th of December the body of Don Neri Corsini was conveyed to Santa Croce, the Westminster Abbey of Florence; and no funeral solemnity—not even that of any member of the Tuscan Royal family—surpassed it in the imposing character of the melancholy rites themselves, but, above all, in the deep grief by which all classes of the population were inspired.

THE LATE MARQUIS DE LAJATICO, SPECIAL ENVOY FROM THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT OF TUSCANY TO THIS COUNTRY.

SHIP LAUNCH AT CASTELLAMMARE, NEAR NAPLES.

AN important incident for Naples took place on the 18th ult. at Castellammare, the principal, if not the only, naval port and dockyard of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. The first screw vessel of war ever constructed there was launched on the occasion referred to, and all Naples followed the Court to see the novel spectacle. The day was unusually fine and the sea like a mirror, so that everything combined to increase the public rejoicing, or rather enjoyment. The special trains began to start as early as half-past eight o'clock from Naples, and, as may well be imagined, in a country where order is little studied or understood, and where excursion-trains are the miracle of a century, there was immense confusion at the station. Many went over in carriages, and as many as four hundred started during the morning, so that the little city of Castellammare was frightened out of its propriety. The view, from a distance, is very striking—a chain of mountains, a spur of the Apennines, forms the background of the city, which lies on a narrow strip of land by the sea. On the bay lay sleeping, decked out as gaily as brides, a Neapolitan frigate, a corvette, and a small steamer; whilst H.B.M.'s noble steam-vessel the Cressy well represented the naval supremacy of England. Small boats by hundreds glanced like fireflies across the tranquil surface of the sea, and, in fact, the whole scene was as lovely and picturesque as any the eye could rest upon. Within the Arsenal, and on each side of the vessel, which was the attraction of the day, were erected several boxes, to which admission was obtained by tickets. His Majesty's box was on the right, in the direction of the sea; and amongst the members of the Royal family were the King and the Queen; the Counts of Trani and Caserta and Gilgenti, the brothers of his Majesty; the Counts of Syracuse, of Aquila, and of Trapani, the Royal uncles; and the Countesses of Aquila and of Trapani; and two of the sons of Count Aquila. One compartment of the box was assigned to distinguished visitors; and, with that marked courtesy which is always shown to the English in Naples, the Hon. Captain Elliot, the commander of the Cressy, some of his officers, and a few other persons, both English and Neapolitan, were admitted into this portion of the box. The diplomatic body were not invited, and, perhaps, it was not an occasion which rendered such an attention necessary. The President of the Council, General Filangieri, was not there, though the other Aides-de-Camp of his Majesty were present. Filangieri is chronically inspetto. Before the launch took place his Majesty moved about and chatted freely with those around him, and, at one time, hands with Captain Elliot, conversed with him with great affability. Her Majesty looked very engaging, and there was many a gros chevalier who thought the Queen the most interesting object in the scene.

The launch was appointed to take place at eleven o'clock; but the masses and the customary Neapolitan delays protracted the event until twelve o'clock. A few minutes before the time the Royal chaplain was seen moving, or being moved, out of a box—for he was too old to stand without supporters—in order to give the benediction to the frigate. Bang! bang! went the hatchets, and away flew the dogshores; but the vessel would not move. Old General Sabbatelli blew, and spluttered, and affected to pull a rope to encourage the men; so did the architect, Signor Di Lucca. Pull away, boys! now for it—a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull altogether! The Borbone moves! and now she descends gracefully into the waters which hereafter are to be her dwelling-place. The cannon fired most unvariously; the galley slaves, who occupied a hulk close by, acted bodily as the fugleman, and their cheer was taken up by the rest of the multitude; but there was no enthusiasm. None cried "God bless him!" There were no "Viva il Re!" or if say they were so rare that they were drowned; and the fact created a sad impression. An Englishman could not fail to draw a contrast between this scene and any similar scene at which our beloved Sovereign might have presided, and where British hearts would have inspired British voices.

Soon after the launch had taken place the Cressy got up her steam, and steered away for Naples. There were many on board, both English and foreigners, who were indebted to the kind hospitality of the commander, Captain Elliot, not only for a pretty run over to the capital, but for a handsome collation, combining all those creature comforts for the enjoyment of which long fasts had prepared the guests. There were music and dancing too, and a warm sun, and a sea so calm that a nautilus might have sailed over it with speed away. Who that witnesses such days in Naples does not weep with regret that what God has blessed man has done his best or worst to curse!

The Borbone is a fifty-four gun frigate, with a movable screw. She measures 226 feet in length, and is longer than the Monarch, architect was Signor Di Luca; and, though some naval critics think her rather too short, she is a very pretty craft. Two other screw-frigates, the Ferdinand II. and the Furmine, are now on the stocks, and one will be launched probably in six months; indeed, there is no power in the Mediterranean which has so large a naval force as the kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

We engrave a View of the City and Bay of Castellammare, taken from the heights. It is a lovely and an interesting site. Nature has blessed it with a thousand charms, and the Spirit of the Past hovers over it, awakening a host of classic reminiscences. We are standing on Stabiæ, close by where Pliny stood during the grand eruption of Vesuvius, and Pompeii is just round the corner on the right.

THE TOWN AND BAY OF CASTELLAMMARE, NEAR NAPLES.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

Napoli, is situated on the lower slopes of Monte d'Auro, an offshoot from the limestone range of Monte Sant' Angelo. It is built, for the most part, along a sheltered beach, commanding an extensive view of the Bay from Vesuvius to Misenum. The position of the town protects it from the east winds. It arose from the ruins of Stabiæ, which was first destroyed by Sylla in the Social War, and was afterwards overwhelmed by the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79. Castellammare contains 18,000 inhabitants. The castle, from which the town derived its name, was erected by Frederick II., surrounded with walls and towers by Charles I., and strengthened by additional fortifications by Alfonso I. The port, which is protected by a small mole with three or four fathoms of water, is secure. It contains a Royal arsenal and dockyard, where the large ships of the Neapolitan navy are built. The spacious quay was constructed by the French, and enlarged by Ferdinand I. The bay, bounded on the north-west by Capo Bruno and on the south-west by Capo d'Orlando, is deep, with a sandy beach. At a short distance from the shore, off the mouth of the Sarno, is a very small rocky island, with a fort, called Revigliano.

LAUNCH OF THE BARQUE "AURA" AT MR. WHEELER'S DOCKYARD, CORK.

LAUNCH AT CORK OF THE BARQUE "AURA."

AN immense concourse of people assembled on the afternoon of Saturday, the 7th ult., at Mr. Wheeler's dockyard at the Brickfields, Cork, to witness one of the most successful launches ever made at that port. On a platform at the bow of the vessel about fifty persons had taken their stand. Amongst these were the Messrs. Henry and Robert Hardy and the Misses Hardy, the Recorder of Cork, Colonel Beamish, Colonel Westropp and the Misses Westropp, Mr. Wheeler, Captain Pollock, Colonel and Mrs. Wood and the Misses Wood, F. R. Leahy, Esq. (Shanakiel), and family, Mr. G. Newenham, and several others. At half-past three o'clock the vessel was, with the accustomed formalities, named the Aura, a signal was given, the shores were knocked away, and the vessel, which was decorated with flags, glided into the water in the smoothest and steadiest style imaginable.

The Aura is the largest timber vessel ever built at Cork. Her length is a hundred and forty feet, breadth of beam twenty-five, and depth sixteen. Her burden is five hundred tons. She is to be barque-rigged, and will be fitted up with every modern appliance by which of late days the working of a ship is so much facilitated. She is the eighth vessel built by Mr. Wheeler for the Messrs. Hardy. The Aura will be commanded by a most skilful seaman, Captain Belcher, a citizen of Cork, and the oldest shipmaster sailing from that port. This gentleman has been thirty-four years at sea, during which time he has made over ninety successful voyages across the North Atlantic and two over the Indian Ocean.

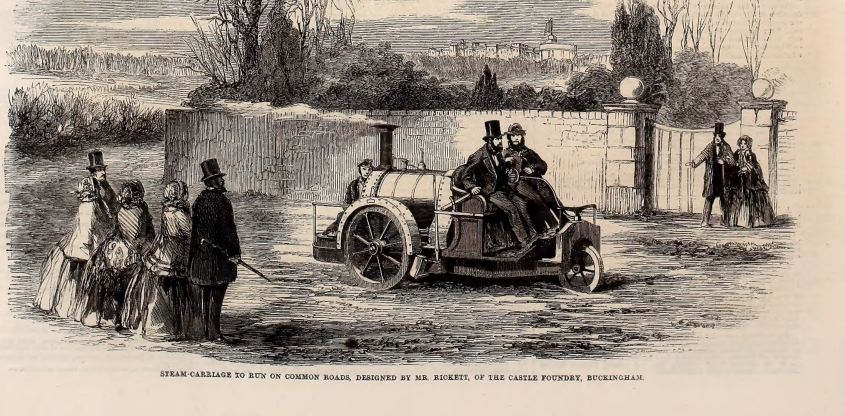
STEAM-CARRIAGE FOR COMMON ROADS.

A STEAM-CARRIAGE, designed by Mr. Ricketts, of the Castle Foundry, Buckingham, to run upon common roads, was submitted to the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal family a short time since. It is built for a private carriage, having ample room for three persons in front and for a stoker behind, and is arranged to run at an average speed of ten miles per hour—indeed, on good roads sixteen miles per hour has been easily maintained. In ascending steep hills, by moving a handle, without stopping, the power is multiplied two and a half times, and the speed consequently reduced to four miles per hour on hills with inclination of 1 in 10. The carriage is mounted on three wheels, each having independent springs—one small wheel in front, which is used for steering, and two behind, one or both of which are employed in propelling, one of them being fixed on the shaft, and the other engaged by a clutch; so that when disengaged the carriage may be turned round in its own length without stopping. It is easily guided, by a handle from the fork of the front wheel, which is central with the outside seat; a break is applied to each driving-wheel, worked by a lever from the seat, so that the engine is entirely under the control of the driver.

The engine is built upon a tank, which forms a strong tubular framework; the boiler being placed above; and the whole of the machinery is contained in the space between the boiler and tank, entirely protected from dust and dirt, and within reach of the stoker for oiling, &c. The tank contains ninety gallons of water, sufficient for ten miles' run. The boiler is made of steel, and constructed so that it is not injuriously affected by variations of level, as it is worked at a pressure of 150lb. to the square inch, and supplies steam to a pair of 3½ cylinders with 7-inch stroke; it evaporates about a gallon and a half of water per minute, and consumes 8 to 10 lb. of coal per mile. The weight of the engine and carriage is 30 cwt., and, with full load of water 12 cwt., coal 3 cwt., passengers 5 cwt., equals 2½ tons.

Some idea may be formed of the functional resistance on common roads when it is mentioned that as much power is required to draw one ton on a common road as fifteen to twenty tons on a railroad; and in this engine, to convey its full load at fifteen miles per hour on a level, requires an actual development of ten-horse power, so that great power and little weight are essentials in these engines. No real difficulty has been experienced in working them: occasionally a young horse shies, when the engine is instantly stopped, and all noise and appearance of steam suppressed till it has passed.

It is stated that this engine will shortly be taken to Belgium, but others are in course of manufacture at Buckingham.



HUNTING WILD HORSES IN SOUTH AMERICA.

THE immense plain of South America is covered with a luxuriant vegetation of long and coarse grass, where herds of cattle and troops of wild horses abound. The latter, said to be the descendants of a few Spanish horses brought over by the discoverers of the continent, have degenerated in outline from their celebrated ancestral stock, although a few are of surpassing beauty; but in character they exhibit a marked contrast to our tamed animals. They are slender and wiry, and their form is rather square than taper; their movements are quick and full of energy, and the glance of their intelligent and expressive eye shows distrust and apprehension of danger; but when caught they are not difficult to tame. They live in herds, and seem to recognise even some kind of social rule; for when they migrate, in the dry season, or at the approach of the rains, the strongest males take the van and the rear, whilst a fine horse seems to guide their march. They send out parties to reconnoitre, which give notice of danger by loud neighs. At other times their sociable life is interrupted by fierce combats, in which they lacerate each other's necks and heads dreadfully with their teeth. Formerly the indigenous tribes caught these horses only for their own use, but a trade in them has now sprung up. The hunters take, usually, each several reserve horses with them, selecting the swiftest. When they near a herd of wild horses the hunters hide their persons as much as possible by hanging to the covered side of their horses; and when in full pursuit throw their looped ropes or lassos and catch their selected prize, even at considerable distances, in the noose. Our Illustration, from a Sketch by Mr. A. Vinkeles, represents a party of South American horse-hunters in the act of crossing a stream.
